Marijuana hearings to proceed

Former faculty members will face possession charges

By Shannon Hartenstein
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Trials will continue Oct. 16 before the Kansas Court of Appeals for two former faculty members who were arrested and charged with possession of marijuana and drug paraphernalia after a traffic stop in August 2001.

The Kansas Court of Appeals will hear the case in suppression of Reginland McGowan, assistant vice president of educational and personal development programs, and Renee Freeman, former director of GEAR UP II (Gaining Early Awareness and Readiness for Undergraduate Programs).

McGowan and Freeman were arrested and charged Aug. 24, 2001, in Junction City. Defense attorneys claim the charges resulted after the two were illegally stopped.

The original Oct. 30, 2001, trial was moved to Jan. 24, 2002. Defense attorneys motioned for another suppression for McGowan's and Freeman's March 15 court date before the Geary County District Court.

Tony Cruz, Geary County assistant attorney, appealed the suppression.

"I hope it gets reversed," Cruz said.

If the case is reversed, it will return to the Geary County District Court later this fall.

Attorney Steven Opat represents McGowan, and attorney Michael McKone represents Freeman.

Freeman resigned from her position Jan. 31, 2002, and McGowan's job duties haven't changed since the arrests. McGowan supervises grants for programs such as Upward Bound and GEAR UP.

Acclaimed author to speak

Lou Douglas lecture to address death penalty

By Dana Strongin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

The death penalty will be the topic of the year's first speaker for the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Issues.

Sister Helen Prejean, author of the book that was adapted into the film "Dead Man Walking," will present "Dead Man Walking: The Journey Continues" at 7 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Prejean might have the best credentials in the nation to speak about the issue, said Anne Cowan, treasurer of the Manhattan Alliance for Peace and Justice, which is co-sponsoring the free lecture.

"She has very clear thinking about the whole thing. Often, people have emotional responses," Cowan said. "This may be very educational for the students to expose themselves to someone's clear thinking on opposition to the death penalty."

Prejean's personal experiences counseling prisoners on death row will help students think about the death penalty, Olivia Collins, series coordinator, said.

"We selected her because of her journey in terms of coming

Women making progress

Political seats not just for men

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Some people say it is a major step. Others say it is about time.

Whatever the opinion, the answer seems clear — women are emerging in powerful governmental positions. In fact, women could take over a record number of governors' offices this year.

"It is expected," Linda Richter, professor of political science, said. "Women have been working their way up through the political pipelines for awhile. There are literally thousands of women who are getting their credentials, and they are starting to emerge."

And are they ever. Women are challenging 14 of the 50 governor positions this November, and as many as eight are strong bets to win.

"Voters are looking past gender and more into pocket-book issues," said Sue Peterson, director of governmental relations for K-State, "and that is what women stand for. They are concerned about paying bills, providing for the family and education. This doesn't exclude men from having these same concerns — it just seems like women think about them more because of their interest."

Winning the governor seat means women would become the dominant political power brokers in their states and perhaps increase the chance that the United States might get its first female president.

"It is a stepping stone," Richter said. "More people are more accustomed to having women in politics, so I think it is just a matter of time before women break those barriers."

Until then, the barriers keep coming down. In Congress, women now have 13 of 100 Senate seats and 60 of 435 House seats. But the race for governor still seems to be the hot ticket.

"Governors are looked at as potential candidates for

Marlon Mitchell, center, of Kansas City, laughs at a remark his nephew, Jordan Taylor, 9, left, made in response to a trivia question he was asked, while Mitchell's son, Marlon Deon Mitchell II, 8, looks on, Saturday afternoon under a tent outside KSU Stadium. ## Catbackers, National Center for Fathering join to bring dads, children closer through football

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGEIAN

Attending a football game might seem normal to K-State students, but to 50 urban Kansas City fathers and their children it was a chance to reconnect with each other.

The National Center for Fathering and KC area Catbackers teamed up to bring 50 fathers and their children from impoverished areas of Kansas City to Saturday's football game.

The group attended the game through a program created by a fathering center called the Urban Fathering Project, which aims to strengthen relationships and interest children in higher education.

"There are two ways to escape poverty — death or an education," said Scott Buie, trainer for the Urban Fathering Project. "It shows there is a real sense of urgency to get kids interested in getting an education."

Buie, a father, said the role of being a dad needs to be more important.

"The role of dad is so crucial," he said. "We have become desensitized to the importance of the father role, and that has to change."

The group enjoyed a lunch at Subway before taking a campus tour and heading to the stadium for a tailgate party and the game.

"We're going to see a football game," Jacobi Buie, 10, said. "I'm excited to see the touchdowns."

Jacobi said that although he never had seen a K-State football game before, he had heard of the team and was ready for the game.

Doug Spencer, event co-coordinator and KC area Catbacker, said football is a good way for fathers and children to bond.

"From the time I was 7 years old, I came to the football games," he said. "Giving the opportunity to come is positive for the kids, and giving dads the opportunity to be involved in their kids' lives is positive for them."

Palestinian lawmakers to discuss election regulations

By Steve Weizman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — Palestinian lawmakers from the West Bank and Gaza Strip will convene Monday for the first time in two years to discuss Palestinian elections sought by Israel and the United States as part of a shakeup of the Palestinian Authority.

Palestinian Cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said Sunday that the meeting in Yasser Arafat's West Bank headquarters in Ramallah would go ahead despite an Israeli ban on 12 Gaza delegates the Israelis say are involved in terror.

"First of all, the government program will be submitted in a speech given by President Arafat," Erekat told Israeli television. "Then there will be on the agenda also the Palestinian election law and programs of reform."

A Western diplomat close to the Palestinian Authority said he expected Arafat's address to the assembly to include a call to both Palestinians and Israelis to end the violence that has torpedoed Mideast peace efforts during the past two years.

Arafat spokesman Nabil Abu Rdeineh said the Palestinian leader was still working on his speech, but he confirmed that U.S. and European officials were pressing for a direct call for a ceasefire.

Israeli officials say they are looking for concrete deeds that go beyond statements.

"We expect actions to end the violence," said Yoram Dori, an adviser to Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Palestinians need Israeli permission to leave Gaza and to travel through the West Bank. Israeli authorities decide according to a person's security background whether to grant the permit.

Israel denied permission for 13 lawmakers to travel from Gaza to the West Bank

NEWSWORTHY

The Associated Press

German authorities had suspicions nearly two months ago about a Turkish man suspected of plotting to bomb U.S. military bases in Germany, but bureaucratic procedures delayed his arrest until last week. Osman Petmezci, 24, and his American fiancée, Astrid Eyzaguirre, 23, were arrested Thursday near Heidelberg, home to U.S. Army Europe headquarters.

Saddam Hussein is seeking nuclear and biological weapons and "the United States may well become the target" of an attack, Vice President Dick Cheney said Sunday. Cheney and top administration officials used Sunday talk shows to propel President Bush's effort to convince the public, Congress and other countries that action against Saddam is urgently needed.

Hundreds of leftist rebels attacked a Nepal police station in a mountain village Sunday, killing at least 49 policemen and wounding 21 others, Home Minister Devendra Raj Kadel said. The rebels, who say they are inspired by Chinese revolutionary Mao Zedong, have been fighting to overthrow Nepal's constitutional monarchy since 1996.

The number of Americans who were victims of all violent crimes except murder fell by 9 percent in 2001, sending the crime rate to its lowest level since it was first tracked in 1973, the federal government reported Sunday.

Helen Giuliani, the mother of former mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who was credited with teaching her only child a sense of history and public service, died Sunday. She was 92.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Police looking for man with lots of concrete

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

During the last four months, an unidentified motorist in a maroon Volvo has been reported by construction workers in the California cities of Fremont, Hayward, Brentwood and Dublin to have approached them and requested that they fill his car with concrete or hot asphalt. An employee of Independent Construction honored the request in May in Dublin, with concrete up to steering-wheel level. The man allegedly said that he was trying to get back at his ex-wife. Police want to question him, according to an August Oakland Tribune report, although they admit he has not committed any crime.

LifeGem Memorials related in August that, using available technology, it can turn a loved one's cremated ashes into a diamond by pressing and heating the ashes to 5,400 degrees Fahrenheit. A chemistry professor cited by The New York Times agreed that the plan was sound; carbon from the ashes converts to graphite, which can be pressurized into a diamond. LifeGem prices start at $4,000 for a quarter-carat.

The District of Calamity

Among recent District of Columbia government mishaps: Twice in June, firefighters had to battle house fires with garden hoses because pumper trucks were out of service. And apparently many police officers were not told about D.C.'s new vehicle registration program, resulting in their ticketing cars without the old (now invalid) stickers, even though owners had conscientiously affixed the new stickers. And D.C.'s Board of Elections ruled in August that Mayor Anthony Williams' name could not be printed on the primary ballot this month because his election workers forged too many signatures on his qualifying petition.

Courthouse follies

Edmonton, Alberta, lawyer Maurice Prefontaine was arrested in March for skipping his contempt-of-court trial, which came about when he referred to Justice Gerald Verville as a "slithering mass (of) vipers."

And a judge in Columbus, Ohio, declared a mistrial in July when lawyer Christopher T. Cicero rushed the phalanx of deputies surrounding his murder-defendant-client Michael Gordon and smacked Gordon in the head (in response to Gordon's threat, according to a bailiff, to "kick (Cicero's) fat ass.")

In July, a federal judge ruled against lawyer Milo J. Altschuler, who claimed that his across-the-knee, bare-buttocks spanking of client Leslie Cerrato in his office was a legitimate trial-preparation tactic (and thus that when she recovered a $250,000 settlement against him for the assault, Altschuler's insurance company should pay it, as "malpractice"). Altschuler claimed that he thought the spanking would improve Cerrato's credibility as a witness.

The U.S. Court of Appeals in Philadelphia ruled in June that lawyer-plaintiff Richard Barrett of Mississippi was entitled to about $30,000 in government reimbursement of legal fees for challenging the protest-permit process in Morristown, N.J., for his small, white-supremacist organization. Barrett admits that court-ordered expenses (from 21 recent favorable decisions) are a major source of income. Barrett showed a few minor defects in the Morristown permit process, for which he originally asked reimbursement at $275 an hour, including 30 minutes' worth of "discussions with client" (presumably, $137.50 for talking to himself).

Awesome!

Football player Dennis Johnson, now an Arizona Cardinals rookie defensive end, began his high school football career at age 6 as a 5-foot-7, 170-pound second-grader playing for Harrodsburg (Ky.) High School, according to an April Los Angeles Times profile. (Nowadays, only ninth-graders and up can play, by national rule.) Johnson appeared in several games that year (after Harrodsburg had built up big leads), apparently holding his own against 18-year-olds.

According to a BBC News dispatch from Harar, Ethiopia, in June, Mulugeta Wolde Mariam ("the hyena man of Harar") has trained about 80 local wild hyenas to congregate around him at night and be fed by grabbing pieces of meat out of Mulugeta's mouth. Said he, "There is no danger unless you are scared, as the hyenas sense fear."

Campus Web design agency alters format, offers more opportunities

Orion Online restructured after four years to reflect independent professional agency

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For students interested in the Web design profession, K-State's Orion Online provides an atmosphere that is akin to a professional agency.

Orion was created in 1998 by Thomas Gould, assistant professor in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

The agency's original name was "The Orion Project."

Orion, which serves small businesses and non-profit organizations, had an administrative facelift this summer.

The changes were instituted to transform Orion into a professional agency and give student employees the chance to be in charge.

The model is not unlike the Kansas State Collegian or KS-DB-FM 91.9, said Dave Smoller, Orion faculty adviser and creative director.

"Before the changes this summer, Orion was just an idea Professor Gould had. It was a bunch of people working on a Web site," Smoller said.

"Now we're giving students the opportunity to run it. They have more responsibilities and a chance to make more decisions."

Orion provides a range of services in an effort to meet customers' needs.

"We've redesigned existing Web sites and built new ones from scratch," Smoller said.

"We do Web site hosting and training - pretty much anything Web-related."

Orion also has had a varied clientele.

"In the past we gravitated towards not-for-profit organizations, but we work for anyone who is interested," Smoller said.

"We've gone A to Z, literally - we've worked with architecture firms and with zoos."

One of Orion's customers is the College of Human Ecology, at www.humec.ksu.edu.

Rita Newell, assistant to the dean of the College of Human Ecology, said the college was pleased with both the Web site and the service Orion provided.

"The Web site is great for our needs," Newell said.

"They were professional and had very good suggestions. They were very helpful to us, especially since we don't have anyone in the school who can devote enough time to the Web site."

Newell said the college, which first started working with Orion at the beginning of the 2002 fiscal year, had a number of reasons to work with the company.

"We were familiar with the group and the work they had done," she said.

"Also, since they're at K-State, we decided to go to them first. We were interested to see if they could meet our needs."

Smoller said that some of the keys to Orion's success are the youth and varied backgrounds of those involved.

"If you look at the people working for professional agencies, they're almost all in their early 20s," he said.

"We're getting the people who are the most excited about doing the work."

Another of Orion's strengths is students' diverse backgrounds, Smoller said.

"Students come from every department, and we take freshmen to students in graduate school," he said.

"This means they each have different strengths and produce fresh ideas every time."

Nationwide tour visits K-State Student Union; prizes to be given away

DaimlerChrysler sponsors promotional, educational events at several campuses

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Road Scholar College Tour, a nationwide campus tour sponsored by Detroit-based DaimlerChrysler, will be in the K-State Student Union Plaza from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. today and Tuesday.

Kimberly Rose, tour director, said the tour is an educational and marketing event that gives students the opportunity to learn about issues such as drunk driving and road rage.

"We're here to educate students of the importance of staying cool as well as sobriety when driving. It's also an opportunity to experience fun," Rose said. "Students can learn about these subjects from the computers and specifically trained staff located in each tent."

Megan Tegtmeier, freshman in agronomy and employee at the Cats' Den, said she likes what DaimlerChrysler is trying to do.

"I think it's a good idea - they're covering stuff we'll all have to deal with eventually," she said.

Around the Union Plaza, tents will be set up for students to play X-Box and PlayStation 2. Two of the featured games are the latest versions of Major League Baseball and the Tony Hawk Pro Skater series. There is also a climbing wall available to students at the event.

At the end of the tour, DaimlerChrysler will be giving away a two-year lease to the winner's choice of a new Chrysler Sebring, Dodge Neon, Jeep Wrangler or Dodge Dakota.

Tegtmeier said she was excited about the prospect of winning a lease to a new car.

"It sounds really cool," she said. "I wouldn't mind having it."

DaimlerChrysler also will be giving away tickets to the 2003 Sundance Film Festival as well as an Infinity speaker sound system.

Students can register for the contest at one of the designated tents on the Union Plaza.

"When students register at the tents, they get a key tag pass, which enables them to play the video games," Rose said. "We get you in the computer, and that's your identity."

TO THE POINT

Women should play larger part in government

Women are incorporating higher political offices into their résumés.

Gubernatorial races will involve women in 14 states this fall, and Congressional seats in Kansas and Washington, D.C., have increasing female representation.

However, women still aren't an equal partner in politics.

Gender statistics at national leadership levels are similar to K-State's — no woman has been employed as university president or vice president.

It's time for that to change.

Women in high-ranking offices provide equal views on pertinent issues. Women politicians come from different backgrounds than men, a vital element in ensuring objective, fair policy.

K-State doesn't have to wait for the nation to justify this trend. It can move ahead of the trend and put women in charge.

We need to recognize women are powerful political voices, and they should be occupying higher positions.

If we don't, the fight for equality will have been for naught.

LIFE SUPPORT

Loved ones should offer support, encourage cancer patients during treatments, recovery

Editor's note: Lorena is an international student from Costa Rica, majoring in education. You can e-mail her at lorena@ksu.edu. Every Monday, she will tackle an issue in her native language, Spanish, as well as English. Both columns convey the same message and allow the Collegian to reach a more diverse audience.

Our era always will be remembered as the age of plagues. AIDS, heart disease and cancer are the three avenger angels of humankind. AIDS is associated with a moral stigma and religious damnation. Heart disease seems to be the high price paid for our obsession with money and success that keeps us running quickly to our graves.

And cancer is the new death sentence. As a woman, I have been terrified by the constant menace of getting cancer. In Costa Rica, breast and cervical cancer rank among the primary causes of death, and every woman is secretly terrified by the possibility of painful and aggressive treatments like radiation, chemotherapy and surgery.

But it was not until recently, when a beloved member of my family was diagnosed with breast cancer, that I became deeply moved and concerned by this disease.

We learn gratefully that medical science and technology keep developing new and more effective treatments. We certainly hope that scientific research might come up with new cures for the different varieties of cancer.

But there are some questions and inquiries about the psychological, spiritual and social dimensions of the cancer experience.

The personal shock and deep sorrow and despair that overwhelm the patient, the strange and unexpected reactions of the family, the spiritual and religious crisis, the economic troubles and concerns of trying to afford the best medical care are there.

Also, the treatment itself takes the patient through agonizing lonely sessions and deep depressions and the crossroads of pain, suffering and anguish that accompany the patient until death.

This drama experienced by hundreds of thousands of women and men, adults and children, is an invisible drama. The surprise attack on the twin towers in New York City created a wave of compassion and national solidarity in the United States, and the floods and earthquakes in Costa Rica called hearts to help and provide comfort to the victims.

But what about the victims of cancer? We treat them as if they might be responsible somehow for their illness.

We push them really hard to become courageous soldiers in the war against the "bad rebel" cells. We invite them to fight, to be brave, to take care of the rest of the family, not to hurt their feelings, to cover their own suffering, anger, pain and despair.

But the patients of cancer are just human beings. They are people with anguish and anger and fear. They need our compassion, our help, our solidarity, our commitment to help them face their sorrow and their fear of death.

We must let them express all their feelings and emotions, not to restrain them to become gentle, kind, patient, courageous automations.

It is not enough to send a "we pray for you to get well" card. We have to be with them to hug, to kiss, to cry, to listen, to talk, to laugh, to dance, to sing, and to share the mysterious drama of life and death.

Yes, cancer should never invade our hope.

Cáncer no puede invadir nuestra esperanza

Nuestra época siempre será recordada como la era de las plagas.

SIDA, enfermedades del corazón y cáncer son los tres ángeles vengadores de la humanidad. El SIDA está asociado con el estigma moral y la condenación religiosa. Las dolencias del corazón parecen ser el alto precio de la obsesión por el dinero y el éxito, llevándonos rápidamente a la tumba.

Y el cáncer es la nueva sentencia de muerte.

Como mujer he sido aterrorizada por la amenaza constante de poder tener cáncer. En Costa Rica, el cáncer de mama y de cérvix predomina entre las primeras causas de muerte y cada mujer vive secretamente espantada por los dolorosos y agresivos tratamientos como la radiación, la quimioterapia y la cirugía.

Pero no fue sino hasta hace poco, cuando una pariente querida fue diagnosticada con cáncer de mama, que me sentí conmovida y realmente preocupada.

A diario nos enteramos de que, por fortuna, la ciencia médica y la tecnología desarrollan nuevos y más efectivos tratamientos, y esperamos que la investigación científica pueda darnos curas para las diferentes variedades de cáncer.

Sin embargo, existen preguntas y dudas sobre la experiencia psicológica, espiritual y social de quienes padecen ese mal.

El impacto personal y la tristeza y desesperación que vive el paciente, las extrañas e inesperadas reacciones de la familia, la crisis espiritual y religiosa, los problemas económicos y la preocupación por tener el mejor seguro médico se hacen presentes.

También, están allí la depresión y el tratamiento, que mantienen en agonía al paciente en sus solitarias sesiones, y el viacrucis del dolor, el sufrimiento y la angustia que le acompañan hasta la muerte.

Este drama vivido por cientos de miles de mujeres y hombres, adultos — jóvenes y mayores — es un drama invisible. El ataque sorprendente a las torres gemelas en Nueva York creó una ola nacional de compasión y solidaridad en los Estados Unidos; las inundaciones y temblores en Costa Rica provocan que los buenos de corazón cooperen y apoyen a las víctimas.

Pero, ¿qué pasa con las víctimas del cáncer? A ellas se las trata como si fueran las responsables de su enfermedad.

Las obligamos a convertirnos en valientes soldados en la guerra contra las "malas y rebeldes" células. Las invitamos a pelear, tener coraje, cuidar del resto de la familia y no herir sus sentimientos, a ocultar el sufrimiento, el enojo, el dolor y la desesperación, y los pacientes de cáncer son tan solo seres humanos.

Son personas angustiadas y enojadas, y llenas de miedo. Necesitan de nuestra compasión, ayuda, solidaridad y nuestro compromiso con su dolor y pánico ante la muerte.

Debemos dejarlas expresar todos sus sentimientos y emociones, no limitarlas a ser gentiles y amables como si fueran pacientes automáticos llenos de coraje.

No es suficiente enviarles una tarjeta con el mensaje "oramos para que su salud mejore." Debemos estar con ellas: para abrazarlas, besarlas, llorar, escuchar, hablar, cantar y compartir juntos el misterioso drama de la vida y de la muerte.

Sí, el cáncer no debe invadir nuestra esperanza.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

The Thursday article about the past football successes was great and everything, but you left something out about Chad May. I was just wondering what he is doing now and where his used car lot is, because I'd like to buy one, and I thought maybe he could help me out.

If my cat rolls around in the dirt and then licks himself, does that mean he's eating mud?

I went to Lafene and told the counselor that I just didn't feel like going to class anymore, and she told me that I had upper management written all over me.

To all the people from Johnson County: Everyone thinks you're special, even the government. That's why they built a type of school where each and every one of you belong. It's called a community college. I agree. Guys who wear flip-flops are definitely compensating for something they don't have, like a decent pair of shoes.

Gov. Graves may have put a knife in the back of teachers, but Shallenburger sure as hell put another one there.

To the person who thinks we should commemorate Sept. 11 by getting over it: You should be thankful you live in a country that allows you to go to any college you want, to study any subject you want. Also, as an American, you have the right to be stupid and call into the Campus Fourum and say stupid things like you said. You are allowed to be a stupid person, stupid person.

Why are statistics from Project Wellness still being used? If you only survey people in the library at 7:30 on a Friday morning, of course you'll find that students drink zero to five drinks when they party. What a waste of tax revenue. How about a real random sampling?

Maybe we should turn some air conditioners on in the lecture rooms. That would be nice.

Instead of Rusty's expanding, how about they just leave forever?

I hope the faculty realizes that without the students, they would not have a job. They should start treating the students with respect.

I think my roommate has the West Nile virus.

Um, is the Fourum for messages? Because, I don't really like messages.

Not enough Fourum in today's Collegian? Check out previous versions online at www.kstatecollegian.com. The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions.

Resident asks for return of property

Editor,

To the three nightly visitors who came to our home at 2:30 a.m. on Sept. 2: I appreciate your removal of the Powercat magnet from the garage door and the four American flags.

But most of all, I appreciate your removal of a sign with my family's name on it that was hanging from the eaves of the garage.

Please display the Powercat with pride and fly the American flags with honor, pride, integrity and dignity.

And as you pass by, please drop off the sign so I can hang it back up.

Please don't throw these items away unless you truly are thieves.

Thank you.

TO THE EDITOR

Experience should guide Bush; leader should reconsider any attack on Iraq

Editor,

Pundits like William Safire and White House insiders like Vice President Cheney are setting the stage for a preemptive strike on Iraq, against the advice of key military leaders and the State Department.

Without strong support from our allies, without a clear end game and with tensions running high around the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, events in the region could easily spin out of control.

Why isn't President Bush listening to the people in his administration who have real military experience and depth in international affairs, like his Joint Chiefs of Staff and Secretary of State Colin Powell?

In Afghanistan, the Northern Alliance provided the nuts and bolts of the offensive, but in Iraq no equivalent indigenous force exists, meaning Americans would suffer much heavier casualties. What's more, the loss of life might be in vain, since there is no viable successor for Saddam waiting in the wings.

In short, the Joint Chiefs of Staff think a war on Iraq is an all-around bad idea. President Bush should listen to his generals and do his homework when deciding how to deal with Saddam Hussein in the coming months.

LOST MESSAGE

Thriller's weak script, storyline fails to teach moral lesson to teens

Stealing from earlier films, "Swimfan" leaves its audience with a rehearsed plot of boy meets girl, girl goes psycho.

When "Fatal Attraction" was released in 1987, "Swimfan's" target demographic was watching "Zoobaby Zoo," and messing its pants. The makers of this movie risk their work on hope that today's teenager has not become acquainted with the film starring Michael Douglas and Glenn Close. It also banks on teens being of about the same mentality as when they were still in diapers.

Jesse Bradford, a poor man's Freddie Prinze Jr., plays Ben, a high school senior trying to swim his way into a scholarship from Stanford. A troubled past involving some substance abuse and a stretch in juvenile detention are presumably mentioned to give his character some dimension and a basis for his fatal character flaw.

His wild days behind him, Ben has reformed his life through swimming and now is so clean and wholesome that you want to punch him in the throat. In addition to being a scholar-athlete, Ben has a job as a candy stripper and even brings flowers to his mother.

Of course a citizen of this caliber has no problem with the ladies, and that eventually gets him into hot water. Ben has an attractive, affectionate girlfriend, but he can't seem to keep his eyes, or his hands, off the new transfer student, Madison (Erika Christensen, "Traffic").

"SWIMFAN"

Movie review by Adam Lee

Ben gets in over his head during an all-too-predictable scene in the school's pool where Madison coaches him in a different kind of freestyle. Or was it the breast stroke?

Madison starts trying to force her way into Ben's life in ways that couldn't accurately be labeled as thrilling. Even when the stalking begins, "Swimfan" barely keeps its head above water.

The film's title comes from Madison's Instant Messenger screen name, which she uses relentlessly to torment Ben. This is supposed to be one of the creepiest parts of the movie, but big deal — at least she wasn't sending him investment tips from the exiled prince of Zambia.

The characters and their actions are ridiculously exaggerated. It is impossible to take the film seriously due to its hyperbolic interpretation of adolescent relationships.

"Swimfan" is a feeble attempt at giving kiddies a lesson in MTV morality. It doesn't seem to have a message to convey except that if you're going to cheat, don't cheat with a psychopath.

DeNiro film depicts murder story loosely based on actual events

Film takes on family, ethical boundaries, moral issues

Combining a compelling story based on true events and an astounding cast, "City by the Sea" is an experience in story-telling, if viewed in a fictional context.

The real and the fictional Vincent LaMarca (Robert DeNiro) is an accomplished police veteran and the son of executed kidnapper and child-killer Angelo LaMarca.

His son is convicted murderer Joey LaMarca (James Franco, "Spider-man").

"City by the Sea," based on the September 1997 "Esquire" article "Mark of a Murderer," takes liberties with pretty much every other detail.

In a fight with a local drug dealer, Joey kills the man in self-defense, making himself

"CITY BY THE SEA"

wanted in the same town where his father was a respected police lieutenant in Long Beach, N.Y.

His father, Vincent, becomes part of the manhunt for his own son, turning around everything he had established in his life. As a true account of the events as they happened, it fails.

Read the original "Esquire" story for a better idea of what really happened at www.esquire.com.

As a story about the struggle between one man's devotion to truth and justice, and the bonds and love of family, it succeeds admirably.

Vincent grows apart from Joey after a messy divorce and hasn't talked to him in years, but when he discovers that his son is wanted for murder, he finds himself struggling with the relationship he never had with his own father and the ruined relationship with his son.

Despite the logic and need for justice that have become entrenched in Vincent through years of being a cop, he still loves his son and wants to find out how all this could have happened.

Fortunately this cast is outstanding. As Joey, James Franco makes a name for himself with this role, and DeNiro shows emotion and thoughtfulness even in the screenplay's sometimes sketchy dialogue.

Frances McDormand gives another excellent performance, though the need for her fictional character can be explained only as a way to illustrate Vincent's attempt to distance himself from his family history.

The end of this movie will have anyone questioning the strength of morals against family, with high tension in an explosive situation.

Just remember, it's mostly just a story.

Aimee Mann album explores dark side

Aimee Mann delves back into the dark side of life and love on her fourth album, the beautiful and mysterious "Lost in Space."

Three years ago, Mann

wowed critics and fans with the "Magnolia" soundtrack and the single "Save Me" that got her nominated for an Oscar. "Lost in Space" offers no changes, or even evolution for fans, but newcomers to Mann's sound will undoubtedly be impressed. This is the same slightly dark, melodic acoustic music Mann has been releasing since 1993.

Mann is a textbook example of how a majors-quality artist can go independent and be successful.

It's taken some time, but Mann was tied up for three years in a contract with Epic that did not allow her to release music on her own. So her work was not released on Epic because of artistic disputes between Mann and the label.

After being released Tuesday, "Lost in Space" holds the No. 1 Billboard spot for Independent albums.

In "Guys Like Me," listeners have to wonder if

Mann is making a jab at the labels when she sings "But you'll agree with the odds on the slate and put your money on a bonafide heavyweight, and take it off guys like me."

Artistically, Mann hasn't changed much, but she is consistently sincere on "Lost in Space." The talent in this album is solid. From music to lyrics to vocals to inflection, this is the total package. Her haunting voice alone makes this the perfect album for lying in the dark and contemplating college depression.

The drawback is that it seems like Mann has found a style that works, and it restricts her from trying new things. Musically, the entire album is solid, but it could all be interchanged with work from 2000's "Bachelor No. 2."

IN BRIEF

Fred Rogers has come out of retirement to tell America it's a beautiful day in the neighborhood and, even after Sept. 11.

Rogers, who greeted the world as Mister Rogers for 34 years, recorded four public service announcements for the Public Broadcasting Service addressing the anniversary of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

A longer, two-minute message can be seen at www.misterrogers.org or www.pbs.org.

Rogers recorded shows in 1968, his first year on the air, after the assassinations of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy. He did another show talking about the assassination attempts on President Reagan, Pope John Paul II and the killing of former Beatle John Lennon.

SCORING SPREE

K-State scores early, often in 68-0 rout of Indians;
Cats play 'complete' game

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At the end of the first quarter against Western Kentucky last week, the Cats were up just 3-0. Against Louisiana-Monroe Saturday, K-State had just four more first downs than its opponent and also ran five fewer plays at the end of the opening quarter.

The difference this time: The Cats were up 28-0 on the Indians.

K-State (2-0) relied on the big play early in the team's eventual 68-0 romp of the Indians, with a 17-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Marc Dunn to receiver James Terry to open the game, then a 51-yard TD pass from Dunn to Terence Newman late in the quarter, and finally a punt return for a score by Newman to close out the opening frame.

And the Cats weren't finished.

Carlos Alsop blocked the Indians' (0-2) first punt attempt of the second quarter, and Danny Morris returned the loose ball for the score.

Then Newman intercepted a pass on Monroe's next drive but fumbled it only to have Josh Buhl take it to the ULM 2-yard line.

K-State punched it in the very next play on the shoulders of short yardage expert Ayo Saba.

The touchdown was Saba's third in three tries this season, each from the 2-yard line.

In a 4:06 span between the first and second quarters, the Cats scored four times.

"Offensively, from week one to week two, we really made some improvements," Dunn said. "We had a pretty complete game tonight."

Dunn, in limited work once again, went 7-for-10 for 147 yards and three scores.

Those passes, combined with the two completed by Eli Roberson and the four completed by Jeff Schwinn were distributed evenly between the Cats corps of receivers.

Seven different receivers caught passes for K-State, with Derrick Evans leading the way with three.

"From a coach's standpoint, you want to look at a glass that is half full, but you see the things you can improve on, so you're really looking at it half empty," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "We executed well, didn't throw any interceptions, so that's positive for us."

But that execution was against Louisiana-Monroe, a team the Cats put 14 points on with Wide receiver James Terry dives toward the end zone, scoring the first touchdown against Louisiana-Monroe in Saturday's game. Terry had two catches for 37 yards and one touchdown.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

By the end of the first quarter in Saturday's 68-0 Wildcat trouncing of Louisiana-Monroe, Terence Newman, the cornerback, was having a solid defensive game.

But Newman, the wide receiver, was about to make a statement.

With 1:26 left to play in the quarter, Newman, the Big 12's defending outdoor 100-meter champion, lined up at wide receiver for the first time this season.

Quarterback Marc Dunn promptly checked off at the line, took a three-step drop, checked right, came back left and fired a 51-yard touchdown strike to Newman.

Then, as the quarter was expiring, the Indians were held on fourth down.

A penalty extended the quarter by one play, and with the clock showing zeros, Louisiana-Monroe punted away to Newman, the punt return specialist.

Newman took the ball, made an inside move to the right side of the field and headed straight for the sideline. Newman used his speed to beat all defenders to the edge of the field, and once he got there, turned the ball up and took it 40 yards for the score.

When asked about the senior, Coach Bill Snyder said the play of his "cornerback" required no explanation.

"Two-play Terence?" Snyder asked. "Back-to-back touchdowns wasn't it? That kind of speaks for itself."

But Newman, the defensive back, was not about to be outshined.

With about 12 minutes to play in the second quarter, Louisiana-Monroe lined up on the team's own 10-yard line for a third-and-12 opportunity.

Newman looked up to see only DaPrato standing in the way of a third touchdown and fumbled the ball. Josh Buhl recovered and took it to the Monroe 2-yard line.

Missing a third touchdown due to a ball-handling error had Newman baffled.

"Man, it was just an unlucky play," he said.

"I wanted three of them, but I'll take two. I was tucking the ball away, and I just fumbled it. I don't know what happened."

Newman finished the game with 42 total return yards, 51 yards receiving, an interception and two touchdowns.

Error-filled games test team's endurance, mental focus

Volleyball's 2nd-straight sweep challenges team's mentality; junior blocker has career day

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lauren Goehring provided the volleyball excitement on Sunday, when there wasn't much to get excited about.

The junior led the Cats (4-1) to a three-game sweep over Arkansas State (3-3), in a match that was hard to stay mentally focused during, Goehring said.

"That third game, we were just wanting to get it over with," she said.

"It was hard, but we battled through it."

K-State did, mostly on the shoulders of Goehring.

The middle-blocker finished the match with 17 kills, sizzling on a .652 hitting percentage. The match was Goehring's best in hitting since her freshman year, when she hit .857 against Air Force.

Coach Suzie Fritz said a performance like this isn't uncharacteristic of what Goehring can do.

"Lauren is one of the best middle blockers in the country," Fritz said. "She's better defensively and offensively when she's in the front row."

Goehring did score many of her kills from that middle position, which was the same place she picked up many of her five blocks.

The junior had four blocks assisted for the match, to go along with one solo block.

Setter Gabby Guerre said Goehring kept the team going when it was tough to stay focused.

"Lauren is a great motivator,"

Guerre said.

"She comes in and tells us to turn it on. She's amazing when it comes to that."

Someone had to keep the Cats motivated, as Arkansas State proved early it wouldn't match up well with K-State.

In game one, the Indians hit just .027, committing nine errors and scoring on just 10 kills.

The Cats spread the wealth in the opening game, as four Wildcat players had two or more kills.

Goehring and Cari Jensen led the way with four each.

K-State showed signs of mental fatigue in game two, as players committed seven of their 14 total errors in that second frame.

The Cats hit just .265 but held Arkansas State to a .125 hitting percentage.

"That was obvious to see that our mentality was to get this thing over

Schwinn, K-State's third-string QB, at the helm.

Coach Bill Snyder said the many improvements the team made in the game were all positive for K-State, but the things the Cats' second unit failed to do show there are more improvements to be made.

"That's the significance of scheduling and the significance of a non-conference schedule," Snyder said. "With the exception of the first drive in the second half, we wanted to get our No. 2s on the field and develop them and get some depth at every position. We haven't gotten there yet."

He said the second string offense made more progress than the second string defense.

Monroe had just 38 total yards of offense in the first half but finished the game with 160 total yards.

It was much the same last week, as well.

K-State's second-half defense allowed Western Kentucky to get over the century mark in rushing yards. This week, the team allowed 95 yards passing to the Indians coming out of the locker room.

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said this was discouraging to see from his No. 2s.

"Last week it was stopping the run. This week it was stopping the pass," Elliott said. "We have a lot of work to do in both areas."

Buhl said the play of the defense in the first half was only an inkling of what K-State can do defensively this season.

Even though the 68-0 performance was a dominating shutout, there's always room for improvement, he said.

"I would hope so," Buhl said. "I would hope that we can always be more dominating."

"We strive to get better each week. We did that this week, and hopefully we can do it next week."

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said Newman's presence on his offensive unit is a welcome one.

"It doesn't take much coaching there," Hudson said. "That was part of the plan. We wanted to continue to bring him along because you can see what he brings to the table - international speed. It's going to be something we're going to continue to exploit."

Newman said his performance was one he won't soon forget.

"It's the first time anything like that has ever happened to me," he said. "I'd dreamed of doing something like that before. I'd dreamed of catching a pass from the quarterback or running back a kickoff or a punt, or of intercepting a pass and taking it in."

"But I never dreamed I'd do it all in the same game," he said.

with," Guerre said. "That's when it got sloppy, but we do a good job of switching it on when we need to."

K-State had to turn that switch on late in game three, when the Indians made things interesting by going on a 9-1 run to pull within two.

But the Cats finished on a 9-4 run, burying the Indians for good. Guerre said the team had a rough time trying to put away its opponent.

"It's tough to play a team like that," she said. "They are a decent opponent but as the game wore on, it becomes more of a mental test than anything."

But Goehring was there from point one to the game finishing block to pace the Cats. She said she felt good about her play against the Indians but was surprised at how good it looked on paper.

"I thought it was kind of average," Goehring said. "But I guess the stats say it was a little better than that."

to attend the session. On Monday, delegates will discuss procedures for holding presidential, parliamentary and municipal elections due by January 2003.

The balloting is seen as integral to promised Palestinian reforms to introduce a checks and balances system into a regime which has been the fiefdom of Arafat alone.

Palestinian officials said some lawmakers want to raise the idea of electing a prime minister who would actively head the government while Arafat, as president, becomes titular head of state with little or no executive power.

GOVERNMENT | More women running for, winning political offices

president," said Kathleen Sebelius, the democratic nominee for governor in Kansas. "It is considered the CEO of the state, and serving in that executive position might break some barriers because women are not typically in those CEO positions. It is a step towards opening that door."

A door to a different style of governing, Sebelius said.

"Women often have different life experiences than men," she said.

"They are mothers and caretakers of older parents. Their work experience is different — they tend to be in health care, teaching or child care. And those experiences bring something different to a legislative discussion."

"The decisions made in those discussions will be more of a representation of the entire population."

The female candidates also would bring in experience. Among the gubernatorial candidates, two are attorney generals, two are lieutenant governors, one is secretary of state, three are state treasurers, one is a state insurance commissioner, one is a former U.S. attorney general and one is a statewide education official.

"They are ready. They have the experience," Richter said. "The party is ready. The public is ready. The only problem is getting more women to put themselves forward as candidates because so many more are qualified."

"They need to realize when they run, they are going to have a good chance to win. Hopefully, this election will set the standards and encourage even more to enter the pool."

FATHERS | Organizations send fathers, sons to K-State football game

Spencer said the Catbackers — a type of booster club for K-State athletics — really believe in this project and were glad to help.

"This was an idea we thought was neat," he said. "They provided the dads and kids, and we contacted people and raised the money."

The National Center for Fathering was created in 1990 to encourage healthy relationships between fathers and their children and to reduce fatherlessness in society.

"Our goal is to encourage dads to be the best fathers they can be," Ken Canfield, the center's founder, said. "We want to engage fathers in healthy fathering in an effort to curb the effects of fatherlessness on society."

Canfield said that although he wanted all involved to cheer for the Cats at the game, he hoped the cheers would start long before the football team took the field.

"For many families, a college education is taken for granted," he said. "In an urban environment, life is fragile and complex. It makes sense to give kids an opportunity to catch the college vision and gives dads the chance to act as cheerleaders."

Canfield said he hopes kids begin looking more toward the future and toward higher education.

"I'm hoping a handful of these kids say, 'Dad, I want to go to K-State someday,' and we want dads to be able to say, 'Here's how,' " he said.

"We want, in the next few years, for applications to KSU to be submitted by some of these kids."

Canfield said many of the fathers involved in the Urban Fathering Project have just come out of rehabilitation centers and are trying to change their lives for their children's sakes.

"Giving your kids a sense of destiny is one of the most important things you can do," he said. "The opportunity to go to a game is huge. Some of these dads have been away for a while and are trying to catch up with their kids."

Canfield said he hopes to continue bringing fathers and children to the games together and said he doesn't foresee any problems with getting participants.

"We had to turn away a lot of people," he said.

"There were so many who wanted to come, but we just didn't have the money for it. There should be a section at each game where people who can't come normally can come experience the size of it."

Canfield, who admitted he's biased toward K-State, said the children deserved to see a place like K-State to get an idea of what the best is and how they can be a part of it.

"I have a degree from K-State, and I have two daughters there," he said. "I think KSU is one of the hidden gems of the Midwest, and I can't think of anything better to give these kids than the best."

to counsel prisoners on death row and how she's come to deal with that," Collins said.

Prejean, a member of Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille, began working with inmates on death row at the Louisiana State Penitentiary in the 1980s.

She related her experiences in her 1993 Pulitzer Prize-nominated book, "Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the United States." The book was the basis for the 1996 Academy Award-nominated motion picture.

Prejean, a member of Amnesty International, still counsels inmates and families of murder victims for a New Orleans victim's advocacy group she founded, Survive. She is the honorary chair of The Moratorium Campaign, a

Woman sexually assaulted

4 unidentified men sought in investigation

By Tara Patty
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Four unidentified men sexually assaulted a 19-year-old woman early Sept. 7, according to the Riley County Police Department.

The woman was walking down the 900 block of Sunset in northwest Manhattan at 2 a.m. Four males in a black Honda Civic with gray interior stopped alongside the woman and pulled her into the car, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup.

Police are still looking for suspects, Moldrup said. The driver was described as an Asian male with black spiked hair and a white T-shirt. A white male with messy hair and a dark shirt was seated in the passenger's side of the car. A black male wearing a dark shirt and jeans, and a white male with blonde hair and wearing khaki pants were seated in the rear of the vehicle.

The four men faced charges of kidnapping and sexual battery charges.

Anyone with information concerning this incident can call the RCPD at (785) 537-2112 or Crimestoppers at (785) 539-7777.

Activities to include moment of silence, time for reflection

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State will mark the first anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks Wednesday with a day of "Remembrance, Hope and Commitment."

"It is incredibly important that we come together as a university family to remember this horrific tragedy and celebrate our heroes and lessons we have learned," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

The commemoration will start at 7:46 a.m. — one year to the minute after the World Trade Center's north tower was hit — when K-State students will pause with the rest of America to observe a national moment of silence. At noon, a commemoration ceremony will begin in the K-State Student Union Plaza.

"This is going to be a great thing to have for the university," said Carla Jones, senior associate dean of student life. "We need to stop and remember what happened last fall and what has been happening since those events."

The Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, will lead the audience in a moment of silence and then several speakers will reflect on the Sept. 11 attacks, including President Jon Wefald, Student Body President Zac Cook and Manhattan Mayor Ed Klimek.

"When deciding to sponsor this ceremony, we took in the fact that K-State had such a huge response at the ceremony directly following the attack," Jones said. "We think this is a way for students to reflect back on the events of last year."

Last fall, more than 3,200 students, faculty and staff gathered to mourn the attacks at a Sept. 14 memorial service. Jones said this commemoration ceremony will give those same participants a chance to remember the day and the events since then.

"I know I have personally started to remember those who died and reflect on my own personal commitment to peace. I am very happy we are doing this because I think it will give others a chance to do the same thing."

In remembrance

Here are some of the campus events planned for Sept. 11.

■ 7:46 a.m. National moment of silence to be observed

■ Noon Commemoration ceremony in the Union Plaza

■ Students representing several campus organizations will place ribbons on the trees in the Union Plaza. The trees, planted last year in honor of Sept. 11 victims, will be dedicated during the ceremony.

■ Union Program Council will show a movie about Sept. 11 in the K-State Student Union.

■ All Faith's Chapel and Danforth Chapel will be open all day.

■ University Counseling Services will be available for support.

Legislators' new restrictions on kegs has buyers

TAPPING INTO A NEW MARKET

Packaged beer sales up; owners anticipated change

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Just as expected, local liquor store owners say, packaged beer sales are up.

Owners predicted before the keg registration law was passed that this would be the outcome. Keg sales would go down, but packaged beer sales would go up.

Mike Towne, owner of The Library Discount Liquor Store, said he is seeing the change. The weekend of the first home football game did not produce the keg sales it did a year ago, he said.

"Early indication is people are moving away from kegs," he said. "But that might be a little too early to call a trend."

The new law that went into effect July 1 requires liquor store owners to put identifying tags on all containers that hold four or more gallons of beer cereal malt beverages. Also, purchasers must register and provide their names, addresses, dates of birth and driver's license numbers.

The Kansas Legislature passed

Steve Wilson, senior in mass communication, puts the registration tag on a keg. The Library is one of a few liquor stores in town that have kegs in stock.

the bill intending to deter adults from furnishing alcohol to minors. The tags and registration gives law enforcement officials the ability to track who bought a keg if it is found at a location where there is underage drinking.

"I just view it as a trade-off," Towne said. "Whether they buy packaged beer or keg beer, it's just kind of a trade-off. They'll trade from one to the other, and business will stay about the same."

After implementation, Towne decided to continue selling kegs. However, some owners decided otherwise.

Ed Rickel, owner of Rickel's Discount Liquor, initially stopped selling kegs. He said the law infringed on people's rights. Since then, he decided to sell kegs again, but only to purchasers who order in advance. However, college students do not want to sign the required registration, he said.

"If they come in, and they reserve a keg, we'll handle that for them," Rickel said. "We tried that with the kids. We say they have to sign it, and they won't, and we can't release the keg if they don't."

Rickel said the law has done its job. It's decreased the access to kegs for minors.

"But they still are going to get the beer," he said.

He, too, said packaged beer sales have increased.

Pete Bodyk, operations manager for Alcohol Beverage Control, said the law has been effective, but it has not led to any arrests in Manhattan yet.

Bodyk said it is possible the law will cause underage drinkers to turn to packaged beer, but ABC is taking precautions against it.

"That's possible, but we're also out there checking for those things, too, with our cops in shops surveillance in liquor stores," Bodyk said.

Towne said he does not think the keg registration will curb underage drinking.

"I don't think it will do anything," he said.

"Unless you have a registration number on every bottle, every can, every item that contains alcohol, I don't realistically understand how in the long run that is going to control underage drinking."

The White House said international opposition to military action against Iraq — at least as a last resort — is softening as more world leaders have said Saddam Hussein cannot be allowed to snub U.N. weapons inspectors. Officials from France, Spain, Denmark and the Netherlands denounced Saddam in exceptionally blunt terms Monday, and some allies said military action cannot be ruled out if Bush works through the United Nations to confront Saddam.

Allied aircraft struck Iraq for the third time in a week, bombing a military facility southeast of Baghdad Monday morning, defense officials said. The attack came after Iraqi forces fired on one of the U.S.-British patrols in the no-fly zone, and it followed bombings on Thursday and Saturday, Pentagon officials said.

Speaker urges education on death penalty

By Dana Strongin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite her open opposition to the death penalty, the year's first Lou Douglas lecturer did not tell the audience on Monday that her opinion is right.

Instead, Sister Helen Prejean urged students to learn, read and think about the death penalty and what it means to death row inmates and murder victims' families. Prejean was the first speaker in the 22nd year of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Issues at a packed McCain Auditorium on Monday night.

Prejean is the author of the 1993 Pulitzer Prize-nominated book, "Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the U.S.," which was made into the Academy Award-winning 1996 movie, "Dead Man Walking."

Prejean, a member of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille, has been counseling death row inmates since the early 1980s.

"Most people are not affected by it personally," Prejean said. "They don't reflect or read deeply into it like they do for other moral issues."

she ever met. At the time she met him, she had no idea that she would eventually accompany him to the electric chair. She described the conflict she felt when she read his file and found that he and his brother had brutally murdered a teenage couple.

"At first, I felt guilt. I was consorting with the enemy," Prejean said. "But then I thought, 'Do we have to be on a side here?'"

"He was no hero. He and his brother had committed this unspeakable act. But he was a human being," she said.

FACES IN THE CROWD

Date set for Ryder's shoplifting hearing

The Associated Press

Actress Winona Ryder's shoplifting case moved closer to trial with a judge setting pretrial proceedings and suggesting the trial will occur in October.

Ryder, 30, did not appear at the courthouse last Thursday for a conference between her attorney and the prosecutor to determine the schedule.

Asked outside court whether negotiations are continuing to try to settle the case with a plea, Ryder's attorney, Mark Geragos, would only say, "We have set a pre-trial date and a trial date."

He did, however, say he would file a number of motions this week.

Los Angeles County Supreme Court Judge Elden S. Fox set a hearing for Thursday and said he expected the trial to begin within 30 days of that date.

Ryder previously pleaded innocent to charges of second-degree burglary, grand theft, vandalism and possession of a controlled substance.

She could face more than three years in prison if convicted.

Patty Duke hospitalized

Patty Duke was reported in good condition after suffering a concussion and skull fracture last week when she tried to apply fly spray to a horse.

The 55-year-old actress, who lives in northern Idaho with her husband, Michael Pearce, was transferred during the weekend from the Intensive Care Unit at the Kootenai Medical Center.

Sheriff's deputies quoted Pearce as saying that he left the barn while Duke was about to apply the spray to a 2-year-old filly in one of the stalls. Then he heard a thump, and the sound of his wife crying out.

When he got back inside the barn, Pearce told deputies he saw Duke on the floor of the stall. The horse was "excited and nervous and startled but not attacking," he said.

Deputies said Pearce let the horse out of the stall and then moved Duke to the center of the stable before calling 911.

Heston to back Republicans

Charlton Heston, actor and National Rifle Association president, will campaign for Republican Senate candidate John Cornyn later this month, Cornyn's campaign says.

"I'm delighted that Mr. Heston has agreed to come, particularly under the circumstance of his recent announcement," Cornyn said in Monday's Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

Heston's announcement last month that he'd begun to exhibit symptoms of Alzheimer's disease hasn't stopped him from campaigning for candidates the NRA favors. Cornyn got the group's endorsement over Democrat Ron Kirk, a former Dallas mayor.

For $75, Cornyn backers can listen to Heston's voice over breakfast on Sept. 21 at South Fork Ranch, made popular by the TV show "Dallas," according to an invitation to the event.

Supporters who give $1,000 can have their pictures taken with Heston and Cornyn.

The 78-year-old "Ben-Hur" star will headline a second event at noon that day in the East Texas city of Longview, campaign officials said.

Griffiths sets record straight

Rachel Griffiths says her character on HBO's "Six Feet Under," the promiscuous, foot-smoking Brenda, is a much better person than she seems.

"The thing you just have to know about Brenda is that her good intention is there," Griffiths tells Entertainment Weekly for its Sept. 13 issue.

"She actually has a clear and apparent humanity, you know? She'd jump in and pull out the drowning child, while the nicer people sitting around would go, 'Oh my God, there's a child in the river! Do something!'"

The 33-year-old Australian is nominated for an Emmy for best actress in a drama series. The show, about a family that runs a funeral home, is up for a leading 23 Emmys when the awards are given out Sept. 22.

In January, Griffiths won a supporting-actress Golden Globe for the role. In 1999, she was nominated for a best-actress Oscar for "Hilary and Jackie."

Community, charity agencies to offer Sept. 11 memorials

Ceremonies in, around Manhattan will honor terrorist attack victims; candlelight vigil, open mic forum, speakers to share message of hope

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents and the surrounding communities will be honoring the lives lost or affected by the Sept. 11 attacks — but all will do it in their own way.

Charitable organizations

The Manhattan Jaycees and the United Way are teaming up to organize an evening ceremony to give residents a chance to honor the people lost and the heroes that are still fighting.

"A lot of people were affected," said Jennifer Duncan, public relations chair for Manhattan Jaycees. "And they still are affected. This ceremony will give them time for reflection."

The ceremony will start at 7 p.m. Wednesday at the Arts in the Park Stage in City Park. The Manhattan Municipal Band will perform. Two speakers also will be featured — Manhattan Mayor Ed Klimek and American Red Cross Disaster Volunteer Renee Spurlock.

"The impact of the events of Sept. 11 were so profound that I think most of us need to mark the anniversary of that event in some way," said Aileen Cray, executive director of Manhattan United Way.

Following the speakers there will be a candlelight vigil and an open mic forum.

First United Methodist

A candlelight Christian-based service will begin at 7 p.m. Wednesday at First United Methodist Church, 612

"It is important that... we react in a way that helps us get to the core in our faith and community."

the Rev. Mitch Todd
FIRST UNITED METHODIST CHURCH

Poyntz.

The event is free and open to the public.

"It will focus on a sense of reclaiming the hope," Jan Todd, associate pastor, said. "We just want to have a place for the community to come and feel a sense of unity after the terrible events that happened in September last year."

K-State Brass will perform "In the Dark," a song the group composed and arranged, and the Rev. Mitch Todd will deliver the sermon titled "Reclaim the Flame."

"I think the idea behind what we are doing is acknowledging that God's power is important above all else," he said.

The ceremony will not focus on remembrance, because, Todd said, since feels this is something that people will always remember.

"Instead I think it is important that we have a sense of unity," she said. "That we react in a way that helps us get to the core in our faith and community."

Fort Riley, Junction City

A commemorative ceremony will start at 8 a.m. Wednesday in Junction City Park to honor those whose lives were lost or affected by the terrorist attacks.

"The main purpose is to gather the off post and on post community together and give them a chance to share their experiences," said Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer for Fort Riley.

The ceremony will begin with an invocation and posting of the colors by a Fort Riley color guard. Several speakers will address the crowd including Col. Frank Helmick, assistant division commander for Maneuver, 24th Infantry Division and Fort Riley; Junction City Mayor Dave Bossemeyer; Junction City Mayor Dave Bossemeyer; Junction City Police Chief Bob Story and Junction City Fire Chief Mike Ryan. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the police, fire and ambulance crews will sound their sirens for 15 seconds as a salute to their comrades who gave their lives in the line of duty on Sept. 11.

The emergency and military representatives will be available before and after the ceremony displaying their vehicles and visiting with the public, Vanover said.

"They want to assure the public they are going to be there for them," she said.

"They want people to understand the selfless service their comrades provided and talk to people about the services they would provide if a similar event happened here."

The emergency and military vehicles will be on display starting at 7 a.m. and the ceremony will be broadcasted live on Sunny 102.5 at 8 a.m.

United Way asks for help with Day of Caring

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This United Way of Riley County will change the way it does things for the eighth annual Day of Caring this Wednesday.

The Day of Caring campaign began Sept. 6, and activities will be extended to Sept. 11 to pay honor to the victims of last year's terrorist attacks, said Aileen Cray, executive director of United Way in Manhattan.

"Because of last year's events, we have decided to change the date," Cray said. "It would be a nice way to pay tribute to those who volunteered in last year's efforts."

Student Volunteers

Interested students can call 776-3779 to volunteer for the Day of Caring.

Student volunteers will be in charge of delivering brochures and putting up posters and signs around the community.

Other volunteers might be working in offices and providing their services, Cray said.

At the end of the day, all volunteers will be invited to a memorial concert in City Park hosted by the United Way and Manhattan Jaycees.

The United Way's annual Day of Caring began in the mid-1980s and was created when working people wanted to see their work in the community in a physical form instead of a paycheck.

As a result, the Day of Caring began and emerged into a community-wide day of hands-on volunteering and providing agencies and clients with assistance.

"I think anyone benefits when they volunteer," Cray said. "When you're having a bad day and help someone out, it makes you feel a whole lot better."

TO THE POINT

Volunteer Fair offers chance to help others, build experience

They've come for our help, and it's time we give them our support.

Today's Volunteer Fair in the K-State Student Union Courtyard will draw more than 20 local non-profit human services agencies. These agencies have been struggling since the nation's economy began its slump.

Now, the agency employees are hoping to recruit students to join their organizations.

This opportunity is mutually beneficial to the student and the agency.

Not only will students have an opportunity to be apart of charitable efforts, but they also can use this experience to build their resumes. Employers view these experiences as eye candy, and students should take advantage of the opportunities these agencies are offering.

And with the anniversary of Sept. 11 on Wednesday, this is a time to give back to your community.

If you've been hesitant to volunteer, now is the time to set aside those reservations and to let these agencies know that K-State students are crucial to the continuing success of the community.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

ROAD RESPECT

All travelers need to share street space with courtesy

Courtesy – the gracious consideration toward others we so often forget in this fast-paced world known as college.

Motorists, bicyclists and pedestrians all need to work together to make sure Manhattan's roads and sidewalks are safe.

This goes for anyone, anywhere, who chooses to use the tools of transportation. Sadly, we've entered an age where road rage runs rampant and friendly travelers are few and far between. Not a day goes by where a pedestrian or bicyclist pisses off a motorist, and vice versa.

In the words of Aretha Franklin, we all fail to "show a little respect" to fellow citizens. So, below are tips that will assist us in our quest to be more civil while traveling.

What drivers can do

■ Stop for bicyclists and pedestrians in crosswalks. Try not to make hood ornaments out of those around you, no matter how good you think they would look. This rule also negates the game where certain numbers of points are awarded for hitting specified targets.

■ When pulling away from a stop sign, yield the right of way to bicycle and pedestrian cross-traffic. Note: When turning left, oncoming bicycle traffic often is overlooked or its speed is misjudged.

Again, I refer to hood ornaments.

■ Give cyclists and pedestrians plenty of room when you are passing or turning. Bicyclists are not restricted to the right lane of traffic, though that's generally where bike lanes are located. Bicyclists and pedestrians can be anywhere, so be on the lookout when you're passing or turning.

Good ideas for bicyclists

■ Wear a properly fitting helmet to reduce the chances of head injury and death. In some places, city or county law requires it. True, they're not very fashionable, but would you rather look dorky for a few minutes or become dinner for scavengers?

■ Always check brakes and tires before riding. You don't want to lose control and take the chance of harming someone's hood.

■ Wear light colors or reflective clothing so pedestrians and motorists will see you approaching, not just when you're right next to them. You don't have to wear neon pink – just don't wear dark colors such as black or navy blue.

Thoughts for pedestrians

■ Always cross at intersections or where there are clearly marked crosswalks. However, don't spend an hour getting to the other side. You tie up traffic and further fuel the road rage mentioned above.

Cross swiftly, and in groups, if you can. There's nothing worse for a driver than having to wait for 50 people to cross the street – separately. If you see someone behind you, wait for them, then cross the road together.

■ Look for traffic when stepping off a bus or from behind parked cars. Especially in a college town, people can't seem to get to their desired destinations fast enough. So, and I can't stress this enough – I return to my hood ornament argument – look both ways before venturing out onto the road.

■ Get in and out of cars on the curb side of the street. This won't be hard to do in Aggieville with the one-way conundrum it's got going on, but it will be more difficult in other areas of town, so keep this in mind if you're parked in a high-traffic neighborhood.

Sharing the road with pedestrians and bicyclists requires mutual respect and awareness. Remember, cyclists have the same rights and responsibilities on the road as automobiles.

Motorists, bicyclists and pedestrians should obey all traffic laws, from stopping for red lights and stop signs to paying attention to lane markers.

Always be alert of all your surroundings, and make sure you give yourself and others plenty of room to travel.

Share the space provided to all of us. It will help reduce the amount of rage, accidents and even deaths.

Academic setting no place for catcalling, sexual innuendo

"Hey, baby! You in the skirt – bring that cute butt over here and I'll let you give me your number."

Comments like these are expected in a bar or a dance club, but I overheard them in a less likely place.

Last Thursday, as I approached the crosswalk in front of Dickens Hall, I observed three male students catcalling female students. I was appalled at the audacity of these young men.

It's bad enough that women cannot avoid being objectified in many social settings, but it is even worse that women are being treated in this manner on campus. The collegiate environment should be one where men and women can come together for a meeting of the minds.

Now, don't misunderstand my point. I do not think that we should try to conduct ourselves as if we are devoid of sexuality. We should not try to deny the fact that some of us are, as healthy young people, very sexually focused at this time in our lives.

Talking frankly about sexuality and acknowledging feelings of attraction is perfectly appropriate. Hurling disrespectful comments at the opposite sex is not.

How is a woman, or a man, supposed to focus on academic matters when facing such blatant sexual harassment between classes?

The brief version of the official K-State definition of sexual harassment is, "any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disparagement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment." For a more comprehensive definition, see the department heads' resource page at www.ksu.edu/dh/sex\_harass/identifying.html.

Even if the incident I observed in front of Dickens Hall did not immediately interfere with the learning environment of the young women, allowing this type of behavior perpetuates an environment where women are seen as bodies instead of minds.

Women's rights have come a long way. With judicial decisions in favor of applying Title IX to the educational environment, women finally have legal protection from sexual discrimination and harassment in schools. While legal action should be approached with caution and reserve, in the cases where severe harassment is occurring women should not hesitate to fight for their rights.

Many members of the student body are simply not treating this issue with its due respect. I have observed female students laugh off or ignore the sexual advances being inappropriately made on campus, but this does not comprise a solution.

What happens ten years from now when male students who have gotten away with harassment in the past continue these behaviors in the real world only to face legal repercussions? It would appear their education at K-State was incomplete because it did not fully prepare them for their occupations.

We all have a responsibility to the campus community to reject discrimination based upon sex. Each individual has a part to play in making our campus a place where people can learn without being made to feel uncomfortable.

I am not asking anyone to deny their sexuality or to attempt to utter only the most politically correct phrases.

What I am asking is that we all show consideration for one another and can the catcalling.

TO THE EDITOR

Earlier letter to editor lacks information; citizens need to have more knowledge on Joint Chiefs' views, actions overseas

Editor,

I would be interested to know where Ms. Phelps gets her information on the views of the Joint Chiefs and the actions in Afghanistan.

Were you there? Did you attend the after-action reviews for any operations? Are you part of the intelligence community? Do you sit in on the briefings to and from the Chiefs? Did any of the media sources you used to form these opinions do any of these things?

Be clear on this: The Joint Chiefs tell the president what missions the military has the capability to execute and how much time, money or material they will need to execute a mission.

That is it. Their role is to capabilities, not policy.

Don't get me wrong, I am very concerned with the direction of the policy. However, unlike Phelps, my concern comes from being one of the people who will write letters to the parents of Americans, should the worst happen.

I hope you spend more time researching your thesis than writing letters to the editor.

Cellular phone emergency calls to become easier

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County 911 dispatchers might have a new weapon in their hands this July.

The county, along with cell phone providers, is working to make technological advances for emergency calls made from cell phones.

In some counties, such as Sedgwick, 911 dispatchers are able to locate cell phone calls by using a computer to find the tower the call came from and the direction it was made from.

Patrick Collins, Emergency Management Director for Riley County, said the county is not at this level of technology but is trying to get there.

He said Riley County is working on Phase 1 of the advancement, which allows the dispatchers to find out which cell phone tower the call was made from as well as the number of the cell phone.

Collins said the county wants to achieve Phase 2 by this July. Phase 2 would include a mapping product to provide the direction the call was made from in relation to the tower. It would give the longitude and latitude within 100 meters.

However, the biggest barrier to achieving these advancements has been funding. Despite advancements, problems can still arise.

Capt. John Doehling of the Riley County Police Department, said Riley County receives an average of 1,000 emergency calls a month. Doehling said the majority of the calls are land line, but there are still a lot of cell phone calls.

Some of the problems are losing a signal, not being able to hear the caller or the caller not being able to give the location, Doehling said.

Cell phone companies have been trying to fix these problems by putting up more towers to ensure stronger signals.

Adam Lams, an employee at Communications Unlimited, said even if a cell phone user's account has been turned off, a 911 call can still be made.

"Even if the owner of the phone is hurt and the phone is locked, a 911 call will go through," Lams said.

Collins said another issue with the technology is that if people are traveling, they frequently change signals. In this case, the system will have trouble if a person is traveling over 66 mph.

Doehling said that if while driving you need to make an emergency call, the best option is to stop on the side of the road.

"Try to pull over at a stable location where you have a signal if possible," he said. "If you're on the phone, you shouldn't be driving."

Collins said drivers need to pay attention. If a person is on the interstate, the mile marker would be an ideal location marker. If that isn't possible, giving an exit number or, for example, saying "I'm twenty minutes west of Topeka" would also be helpful, Collins said.

Collins said that even though the new plan might be costly, it will be validated when it is in full use.

"If just one life is saved, it was worth it," he said.

CES stresses importance of volunteering

Annual fair brings 24 non-profit organizations looking for student help

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Because the nation's economy has been suffering in the past year, organizations around Manhattan are coming to K-State to find volunteers.

"About 60 percent of our volunteers are KSU students, and they're important to us," said Jayme Morris-Hardeman, advocate supervisor at Sunflower CASA project. "It's a great place to recruit volunteers."

K-State will have its annual Volunteer Fair from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Wanda Arocho, a graduate assistant at Career and Employment Services, said volunteering is important for many reasons.

"Not only does volunteering make you feel good, but you often get out more than you put in," she said. "From the student perspective you get exposure to possible internships and careers. It helps you build experience for your resumé."

Arocho said there will be 24 local non-profit human services agencies at the fair to recruit student volunteers.

She said recruiting volunteers in this manner is good for both the agencies and the students.

"For the agencies, it's a great way to talk to lots of volunteers," she said. "For students, it's a good way to learn how to volunteer. It gives them a chance to get job experience, plus it's a great thing to have on their resumé."

Amy Webster, senior in family life and community service, said that although the job experience is useful, she volunteers for different reasons as well.

"It's important to help people, especially those who may not be as well off as you are," she said.

Morris-Hardeman said college students especially should get involved in the community.

"I think volunteering is an important experience to have while in college," she said. "Everyone should come out and learn about the different organizations in Manhattan."

Arocho said she believes that college students should become more involved in the community.

"Volunteering is an excellent way to become part of the local community and to give back to the community what is being taken out," she said.

Webster said she gets personal fulfillment from her time volunteering.

"I really like doing it — seeing other people happy makes me feel good," she said. "Volunteering is something I'm good at."

Support grows in favor of military action against Iraq

By Ron Fournier
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The White House said international opposition to military action against Iraq is softening as more world leaders have said Saddam Hussein cannot be allowed to snub U.N. weapons inspectors.

Officials from France, Spain, Denmark and the Netherlands denounced Saddam in blunt terms Monday, and some allies said military action cannot be ruled out if Bush works through the United Nations to confront him.

The comments, a significant shift in tone among wary U.S. allies, came as senior administration officials said Bush planned to urge the U.N. on Thursday to demand Saddam open weapons sites to inspections or face punitive action.

In his address Thursday to the U.N. General Assembly, Bush is not expected to set a deadline nor spell out the consequences — leaving the finer points to U.S. and U.N. diplomats who may set a formal resolution — but his address will make it clear that military action will be taken if Iraq doesn't comply, officials said.

The officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said

Bush is convinced Saddam will provoke military action.

Bush's case was bolstered by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a London group that issued a report saying Iraq could build a nuclear weapon in a few months if it obtained radioactive material. It warned, too, of Saddam's powerful arsenal of chemical and biological weapons.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Naji Sabri called such claims "false pretenses, false accusations" designed to turn the world against Iraq.

White House aides said while few allies are fully behind Bush, the recent comments of world leaders suggest the debate has shifted from a question of whether the U.S. should confront Saddam to how it should be done.

U.N. inspectors trying to determine whether Iraq possesses biological, chemical or nuclear weapons left Iraq in 1998 and have been barred from returning despite several U.N. resolutions. Bush intends to tell world leaders the relevancy of the U.N. is at stake as he seeks to disarm Saddam.

"It does appear that a movement is budding to put some force to previous U.N. resolutions," White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said.

Watkins paces Cats in Lincoln; K-State in 3rd place

Cats 6 off pace of Oklahoma City at site of team's last individual medal

By K-State Sports Information

The K-State men's golf team is in third place after the first two rounds of the Fairway Club Invitational at the par-71, 6,762-yard Firethorn Golf Club.

The Wildcats posted a 582 (139-147) on their opening day, and is just six strokes out of first.

Junior co-captain Aaron Watkins led the team, carding a 3-under-par 139, to tie Oklahoma City's Andreas Rydholm for the lead.

Freshman Josh Persons was solid in his college debut, carding a 147 (73-74) to tie for 17th.

One stroke behind Persons is junior Lincoln-native A.J. Elgert, who made a six-stroke improvement during the second round to finish with a 6-over-par 148 to tie with junior Greg Douglas. Sophomore transfer Matt Van Cleave is tied for 36th at 152.

Sophomore Nick Schumacher, competing as an individual, carded a 162 to tie for 62nd.

Oklahoma City shot a 576 to lead the field heading into the final round. Big 12 rival Iowa State posted a 577 for second place.

The young Wildcat squad had three players who were seeing Firethorn for the first time.

Coach Tim Norris said their inexperience may have caused a few setback holes during the first round.

"This tournament is not an easy first outing," Norris said.

"But it's definitely a good one to get under your belt and you are able to see where you need improvement."

It was the first tournament for Watkins since his appearance in the United States Amateur in August, when he broke into the round of 32.

Watkins was eventually eliminated 4 and 2 to Conner Robbins of Washington.

The Fairway Club Invitational was the site of the Wildcats' last individual medal win. Bryan Milberger claimed medalist honors in 2000, after firing a 74-69-71=214, to earn a one-stroke victory over Sam Houston State's Jon Antunes.

The Fairway Club Invitational concludes Tuesday with a 9 a.m. shotgun start.

For complete results of the Fairway Club Invitational, visit Nebraska's, the tournament's host team, Web site at www.huskies.com.

FRIENDLY COMPETITION

Cross country team kicks off season on right track; men, women each earn top spot at Harrier Relays

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Competition for the Wildcat men's and women's cross country teams was intense Saturday at the K-State Harrier Relays in Topeka, but only between the Cats themselves.

The women's pairings swept the top four places in the two-mile race, with Amy Mortimer and Shauna Burrell claiming first, while the men scored a first place finish from the duo of Mathew Chesang and Drew Tonniges.

Mortimer and Burrell's time of 23:05 was good enough for first, but just barely.

Teammates Trisha Culbertson and Cate Holston were second by just one second.

Times were represented by the combination of individual scores coupled with pair's time.

Chesang and Tonniges cruised to their victory, as their closest competitors finished nearly one minute behind.

Coach Randy Cole said it was a good warm-up race for his team.

"I would rather wait until October because the races are more competitive, but they say we have to have so many races by then, so this was a good way to race in a competitive atmosphere early," he said.

"By doing this, all our races aren't bunched later in the season and it's good because we can train a little earlier."

A competitive fire was definitely present on the women's side, Cole said, because all Cat runners ran relatively close to each other.

Erin Mortimer finished with a split time of only two seconds slower than her sister Amy's, as she and Monica Anderson finished just 30 seconds behind the second place team of Culbertson and Holston.

"Erin and Trisha came in right after Amy did," Cole said. "It was great to see everyone running close together."

Although the competition wasn't as close on the men's side, with Chesang smoking the field with a 9:21 2-mile time, Cole said he wanted to get a first place finish, so he put Chesang and Tonniges together on the same score card.

"Mathew went out and just hammered it those two miles," Cole said. "That gave Drew a good lead, and a good cushion to work with."

K-State will be in action at the same spot next weekend when they host the Wildcat Invitational on Saturday.

Cole said running at the Old State Hospital Grounds this weekend allowed the Cats to get a feel for their surroundings so they will be adequately prepared for Saturday's competition.

The Wildcat Invitational race will consist of a 4-mile race for the men and a 2.5-mile race for the women.

"The two-mile run was run, we could be very aggressive and just get out and go," Cole said. "It was also like a dress rehearsal for Saturday's race. I think we'll be ready."

Freshman Erin Mortimer runs the first leg of the four-mile relay Saturday at the Kansas State Harrier Relays in Topeka. The women's cross country team placed first, second, third and fourth in the 13-team field.

College football | Newman named special teams player of the week

Baylor running back Jonathan Golden, Nebraska cornerback DeJuan Groce and K-State's Terence Newman have been named Big 12 offensive, defensive and special teams players of the week.

Golden ran for 108 yards and scored six touchdowns in the Bears' 50-12 win over Samford.

Groce, the defensive player of the week, intercepted two passes for the second consecutive week as Nebraska beat Utah State 44-13. Groce was the Big 12's special teams player of the week last week.

Newman — a cornerback, kick returner and wide receiver — took the award this week. He ran a punt back 40 yards for a touchdown and had three punt returns for 42 net yards in the Wildcats' 68-0 win over Louisiana-Monroe.

He also got an interception and caught a touchdown pass.

MLB | Dodgers' pitcher skull shocked

Los Angeles Dodgers rookie left-hander Kazuhisa Ishii, hit in the forehead by a line drive, had a two-hour operation Monday to remove bone chips from his nasal passage.

He will remain hospitalized for at least a few days, Dodgers head trainer Stan Johnston said.

A CT scan after the operation was deemed normal and the Japanese pitcher was "eating and walking," according to the Dodgers. Ishii also sustained a small skull fracture and a concussion.

Ishii, who turned 29 Monday, was struck by the line drive hit by Houston's Brian Hunter in the fourth inning of Sunday's 6-2 loss to the Astros. Hunter drove the 3-2 pitch so hard into the left side of Ishii's head that the ball ricocheted to the backstop. Hunter wound up with an RBI double.

Sacramento Kings star Chris Webber was indicted Monday on charges he lied to a grand jury about his dealings with a University of Michigan basketball booster more than a decade ago.

Webber, who led Michigan's "Fab Five" team to two NCAA title games, was charged with obstruction of justice and making a false declaration before a grand jury, FBI spokeswoman Dawn Clenney said.

Webber's father, Mayce Webber, and his aunt, Charlene Johnson, were indicted on the same charges.

If convicted, each faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Baseball asked a federal judge to dismiss the lawsuit filed by the former minority owners of the Montreal Expos, and to disqualify the lawyers because they also have done work for the Texas Rangers.

In addition, baseball asked U.S. District Judge Ursula Mancusi Ungaro-Benages to move the case out of Miami and to put the lawsuit on hold pending an arbitration demand filed by the limited partners. Lawyers for the commissioner's office and former Expos owner Jeff Loria filed the motions late Friday.

The 14 former minority owners of the team sued commissioner Bud Selig, baseball chief operating officer Bob DuPuy, Loria and others in July under federal racketeering laws, accusing them of mail fraud and wire fraud and alleging they conspired to eliminate the Expos.

Cats' early wins should be taken with grain of salt; Chiefs lucky to snatch win

Before beginning this column, let me pause for a moment to reflect on Sept. 11, and what the day will forever mean to America.

To the victims of this tragedy, you all deserve the world.

It is important to pause because a year ago, sports seemed foolish. When the planes hit the towers that fateful day and another hit the Pentagon, sports seemed meaningless.

The attacks changed a lot. Suddenly, who K-State played or didn't play really didn't matter. I became a New York Yankees fan (though only briefly). America saw sports as a part of the healing process. Perhaps baseball players didn't strike this season because of those moments.

But that's all on this topic. Tomorrow will not be about how some columnist was affected — it should be about the victims and their families.

Just know you all are still in my thoughts, and America will persevere.

■ On a much less important note, is anyone else ready for the Southern California game? I cannot wait until Sept. 21.

We need to find out if these players can play. We need to see the offense function against a quality opponent to truly evaluate the quarterback position.

I don't know that I can take another 68-point victory. Only two positive results come out of these games. No. 1, K-State fans get to be myopic about the team. Everybody looks like an All-American when they are taking on sub-par opponents. Fans eat that stuff up. They should because that's what fans do. They exuberantly cheer when the team is winning and sob when the losses mount.

The second thing that comes out of it is that Louisiana-Monroe makes a lot of money. K-State must pay a hefty sum for Monroe to come in and take their lumps.

Perhaps it helps Louisiana-Monroe meet the Title IX standards. For the sake of liberation, I guess I am fine with it, but this week can we please get a running clock for the second half. It's an afternoon kickoff and the temperature is supposed to be in the 90s.

The quicker this game goes the better. We'll be a step closer to the USC game and seeing what K-State is going to do this season. If the blowout victories are legitimate then Manhattan will be exciting this fall. I guess we'll have to wait another week.

■ And finally, as uninteresting as K-State's game was, the Kansas City Chiefs game was equally exciting.

The ending of the game

went from a helmet's throw chance in hell of winning to being victorious. Things can truly change in an instant. It is a good day to be a Chiefs fan. Which begs the question, would you rather be lucky or good?

It is hard to decide. The Chiefs played a lot of good games last season and lost. Sunday they played awful defense and managed to win on their opponents' stupidity.

Much like K-State, we'll find out more about the Chiefs as the season unfolds.

FACES IN THE DARK

Feminist artist uses political statements as inspiration for mysterious works

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The first things you notice are the faces. The gaunt, minimally detailed, but completely fleshed out faces of women in simple clothing stare out at the viewer from inside the black environment Barbara Waterman-Peters, 1998 K-State graduate, has created for them.

Standing in front of several of the paintings is like being in front of an audience. The varying expressions and wide eyes of Waterman-Peters' characters in her "Women's Series" seem almost to react to whoever is watching while other characters in the art go on about their business.

Waterman-Peters has been working on her "Women's Series" since 1992, and her latest installments are now on display at the Strecker-Nelson Gallery, 406 1/2 Poyntz until Oct. 26. The dark paintings all feature women figures in different settings. Some are interacting and some are alone. Some are disguised in clown-like makeup and some look very plain.

The meanings are always different, and if a story exists behind any of the works, Waterman-Peters isn't telling.

"I don't intend any particular stories, and if there is one then it's very loose, and I'm not telling anyone what it is," she said. "I want the viewer to have the opportunity to spin their own tale about what's going on."

Viewers often gravitate to the dark colors and themes that permeate Waterman-Peters' work when coming up with meanings and stories for the art. That darkness is something the artist has called protective and safe. She associates the darkness with shelter such as caves or houses, or the cover of night when actions can be hidden.

But that doesn't mean everyone sees it that way. "I like to have people come up to me and ask questions and tell me their perceptions, and sometimes they bring responses to the work that I had possibly never thought of or intended," she said. "Someone once said it looked Satanic, which was the farthest thing from my mind, but it gives me food for thought."

The series deals mainly with women and their roles. In fact, none of the paintings contains any male figures. This is derived, in part, from the artist's feminist background.

Waterman-Peters said that while attending Washburn University, where she graduated in 1973, she was aware of the feminist movement, but didn't have the chance to be an activist.

"I was a young mother and wife taking 18 hours of credit to get through so I didn't join any protests or anything like that," she said. "I was active as an individual because I had been discouraged from studying art and told I should learn things like shorthand and typing. Those were the things a good little woman should do."

While in graduate school at K-State, Waterman-Peters took women's studies classes and her paintings started to take on a different feel.

Her first works in the "Women's Series" featured women with ugly, contorted, sometimes animal faces with no arms, or sticks for arms, and they were devoid of all femininity. The figures were often victims responding to circumstances. Now the figures have evolved, Waterman-Peters said.

"They have become softer and more naturalistic," she said. "Instead of being reactive to things that have been done to them and things going on in the world, they've assumed a self-confidence that allows them to examine their place in the world with more power."

The long-lasting and evolving series is not how Waterman-Peters began. She started out with water paintings of landscapes and abstract art. When she was working in the 1970s, minimalism and abstract were popular and anything figurative was somewhat discouraged, she said.

While working on a political series in response to the Gulf War, the destruction of the Berlin Wall and other historic events, Waterman-Peters said she included two female silhouettes in one piece to give it a sense of scale.

"At that point I discovered a whole new thing going on," she said. "I had to ask myself why I found two female figures confronting each other so disturbing. Then I started thinking about the patriarchal society I grew up in."

"My father died when I was very young. I grew up with my mother, my grandmother and my sister, and I went to Catholic school where I was taught by nuns, so I was always surrounded by females."

At first, the series didn't seem like a good idea because Waterman-Peters was afraid no one would be interested in buying the art. Fortunately, buyers have shown more interest in her "Women's Series" than they did in her landscapes.

"Both men and women have been very responsive to this work," she said. "I think they all find something different recognizable in the imagery. Children really seem to like it, and that's the ultimate compliment because if they don't like it, they'll tell you."

One recurring theme in the work is that of placing the figures around a table, such as the women in "The Guest II," and "A Bone to Pick." Waterman-Peters describes the act of sitting around a table as cul-

"In families, what is said around the table can be very supportive, or wounding, or funny," she said. "It can be torment to sit with certain people at the table and get through a meal."

"Even the order we sit around the table and the positions take on meaning. The formality is meaningful. Is it good China, or plastic? This is all highly charged symbolism, and they are means for me to talk about the figures' roles and positions."

The latest step in the evolution of Waterman-Peters' art features something new. This is the first time the artist has shown any piece from her "Women's Series" done in watercolor. "Calla" is one of the two watercolors and features a calla lily in the foreground next to a woman with a painted face.

"I have been attempting to interpret this series in watercolor for a number of years, but I haven't been happy with the results," Waterman-Peters said.

As for what comes next, Waterman-Peters is already studying for her next pieces.

"I'm doing research on crows for my next painting," she said. "I'm watching a video called 'Seven Crows a Secret,' and I stop the video as it goes to study the poses of the birds."

IN BRIEF

Most books are lifeless once-and-done affairs, sitting on their owners' shelves where they sit gathering dust, — not unlike some mounted trophy game.

Ron Hornbaker believes they would be better off in the wild so others could read them.

Hornbaker is the founder of BookCrossing.com, an Internet book club that combines karma and kismet and encourages people to leave their books at coffee shops, parks, airports or anywhere else. Books are registered online, which allows members to follow where the books travel and who reads them.

As word spreads, membership has surged, turning the world into a sort of virtual library — with no late fees.

Lori Butler, a member from Upper St. Clair in suburban Pittsburgh, stumbled across the site, www.bookcrossing.com, while surfing the Internet and thought it would be a fun way to unload some of her books. She left her first stack on bleachers at the school pool where her children swim.

"I have tons and tons of books. It comes with being a teacher and librarian, I guess," said Butler, 34, a substitute teacher. "I just have too many to hold on to."

VH1's "Music Behind Bars" shot scenes for the new program at Mount Olive Correctional Complex recently.

The show, which premieres next month, features songs created and performed by prison inmates.

We are trying to focus on the real music and the real people that exist behind bars," executive producer Jay Blumenfeld said.

"In this kind of show, we are not trying to produce television with a capital 'T,' we are trying to tell it like it is. No lights, no huge cameras," he said.

A four-person team was at the Fayette County maximum security prison for four days to film musical performances and interview inmates and staff.

DEATH PENALTY | Author offers insight on capital punishment

Throughout her speech, Prejean used her Southern accent and saucy humor. But whether the audience was laughing or silent, Prejean focused on her message.

"You don't have to change the world," she said. "You just have to hear people's cries."

After the lecture, audience members stood to ask Prejean questions.

One of those members, Josh Sturgis, senior in political science, said he is opposed to the death penalty and hoped Prejean would change some minds.

"She was very concise, and hearing it from her mouth was a gift to all who heard it," Sturgis said.

Jennifer Sellens, senior in criminal justice, also stood to ask Prejean about how to overcome her timidity to admit she's against capital punishment.

"She was wonderful. She brought a new side to the issue, a side that most don't see and can't see," Sellens said.

Nepalese retaliate against Maoist attack

By Binaj Gurubacharya
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KATMANDU, Nepal — Royal Nepalese Army soldiers launched a counterattack Monday after Maoist guerrillas killed at least 57 soldiers and policemen in a mountainous area overnight, a government minister said.

Devendra Raj Kadel, the junior interior minister, said the army was fighting near Sandhikhara, about 190 miles west of Katmandu, where rebels killed 40 police and 17 soldiers hours earlier in their deadliest assault since the government lifted a state of emergency two weeks ago.

"We have reports that a group of rebels who were fleeing from Sandhikhara have been found and we have sent additional forces to combat them," Kadel said.

Also Monday, an army bomb squad defused an explosive device planted in Katmandu's main market. No one was injured but traffic was blocked for hours. Rebels have been blamed for a series of recent explosions in Katmandu that killed at least one soldier.

Bush uses meeting with Canadian leader to present plans for Iraq, border security

By Jennifer Loven
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — In the shadow of a bridge that is the busiest crossing point between the United States and Canada, President Bush and Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien declared Monday that a new quick-pass system for trusted regulars would boost security and speed commerce between the two countries.

"This great and peaceful border must be open to business, must be open to people, and it's got to be closed to terrorists and criminals," Bush said, as a trickle of trucks rattled across the flag-adorned Ambassador Bridge that connects the two countries. "Our inspectors will spend less time inspecting law-abiding citizens and more time inspecting those who may harm us."

Bush also held a behind-closed-doors session with Chretien in which he pressed his case for action against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. Chretien, like many other world leaders reluctant to join a military campaign against Iraq, has said he has yet to see evidence that would justify Canadian support.

Neither leader would comment afterward to reporters and included no mention of Iraq in their public remarks. Bush spokesman Ari Fleischer said that Bush, having not asked Chretien to change his view, won no commitments.

As they have recently started doing with regularity, small groups of anti-war protesters greeted Bush's motorcade on its short trip through town. "Drop Bush, not bombs," said one handwritten sign.

The small audience of customs officials and local business people, which responded to Bush's speech with only tepid applause in places, also seemed more preoccupied with Iraq than the day's official topic of border security.

"He needs to get the other countries behind him before he moves," said Dick Pierson, the owner of a lumber and building wholesale company in New Baltimore, Mich., who echoed many others present.

Bush and Chretien applauded two programs meant to speed prescreened trucks and individual travelers across the nations' long, shared border — which logs $1.3 billion in trade each day.

"The threat of terror will not undermine the security of our citizens or hold our economies hostage," Chretien said.

The Free and Secure Trade Program will allow U.S. and Canadian companies to register, starting Monday, their goods, trucks and drivers with the governments ahead of time. As of December in Detroit and five other crossings, the trucks will be able to cross through special lanes, their information instantly verified by computer.

Restrictions after the terrorist attacks snarled traffic at the border here and resulted in parts shortages, causing some temporary shutdowns at auto assembly plants.

A similar program allows low-risk individual travelers to get special photo identification cards enabling them to zoom through dedicated lanes at border checkpoints. Now in use at four crossings in Washington state and Port Huron, Mich., applications were being accepted starting Monday for use in Detroit.

The program — called NEXUS — should be in operation at all high-volume crossings by the end of next year. About 200 million people cross the U.S.-Canadian border each year.

Customs officials from both countries gave Bush and Chretien a demonstration with a few preselected 18-wheelers and passenger cars.

"You're a good guy, apparently," Chretien joked to one minivan driver after glancing at the information offered on the man on the computer screen after he waved his card at it.

"Stop times will be reduced from a few minutes to seconds," Bush said later.

However, the event significantly slowed traffic across the bridge. Officials had warned truckers ahead of time to find other routes — or another day — to cross; normally the span carries about 6,000 trucks a day.

Both measures were part of a 30-point plan that the two countries endorsed in December to enhance border security and maintain the flow of people and goods.

President has repeatedly rejected funds that border agencies say are desperately needed.

Democrats on the House Appropriations Committee, meanwhile, released a statement saying that Bush's statements on border security belied his administration's repeated rejections of additional funds requested by the U.S. Customs Service, Immigration and Naturalization Service and other border agencies.

Allied aircraft respond to Iraqi fire over no-fly zone

By Pauline Jelinek
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Allied aircraft struck Iraq for the third time in a week, bombing a military facility southeast of Baghdad on Monday morning, defense officials said.

The attack came after Iraqi forces fired on one of the U.S.-British patrols in the no-fly zone, and it followed bombings on Thursday and Saturday, Pentagon officials said.

It brought to 37 the number of strikes reported this year by the United States and the United Kingdom coalition put together to patrol zones in the north and south of Iraq following the 1991 Gulf War.

"There is a price to pay when you attack U.S. and British planes," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

In Baghdad, the official Iraqi News Agency quoted an unidentified military spokesman as saying, "American and British evil warplanes violated our skies on Monday coming from Kuwait to bomb civil and service installations." The spokesman gave no further details.

In Monday's strike, coalition aircraft used precision-guided weapons to hit an air defense command and control facility near Al Amarah, about 170 miles southeast of the Iraqi capital, the U.S. Central Command said.

The command called it "a self-defense measure in response to Iraqi hostile threats and acts against coalition forces and their aircraft."

Monday's strike was in the southern zone, set up to protect Shiite Muslims, and it was the 27th one in the zone this year.

In the northern zone, set up to protect Kurds, there have been 10 this year. Both groups were given protection after unsuccessfully revolting against the regime of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Counterattacks by coalition planes were made 43 times in the northern and southern zones in 2001 and 80 times in 2000, officials said. Asked if Iraq was increasing its attempt to shoot down coalition planes or the United States was trying to make some point with the frequent retaliations, Pace said that over time, the number of Iraqi attacks has been fairly consistent.

"What we are certainly trying to do is to not accept that at all and to ensure that any time that they shoot at our coalition aircraft that we respond," Pace said in an interview with wire service reporters.

The strikes come as President Bush's administration increases efforts to convince the world of the need to overthrow Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, and as Iraq wages a campaign to rally the world against such a move.

But attacks and counterattacks in the no-fly zones have been going on for several years.

The Pentagon says there is no particular increase now.

Iraq considers the patrols a violation of its sovereignty and frequently shoots at the planes with anti-aircraft artillery and surface-to-air missiles. In response, coalition pilots try to bomb Iraqi air defense systems.

U.S. approves aid to Colombia

$41.6-million package clears State Department to assist military units

By George Gedda
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The State Department cleared the way Monday for providing $41.6 million in military aid to Colombia after certifying the country's armed forces had met human rights standards in three areas.

Release of the funds was contingent upon a department finding that the Colombian military had suspended personnel guilty of grave human rights violations, cooperated with civilian prosecutors in rights cases and was severing ties with right-wing paramilitary groups.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said that while the certification signifies "real progress" in Colombia, "much more needs to be done to improve the human rights performance of the armed forces."

Congress insisted on the three human rights conditions when it approved military assistance for Colombia last December. A certification in May led to the release of $61 million.

Colombia's defense minister, Martha Lucia Ramirez, said the certification underscored "the commitment of our security forces to respect human rights."

"It is important that we here in Colombia shed ... the belief that our security forces violate human rights in Colombia," Ramirez told a news conference in Bogota, the Colombian capital.

She insisted that Colombia's military and police fight an outlawed right-wing paramilitary group with as much vigor as it combats leftist guerrillas.

Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage formally certified Colombian compliance Monday morning, prompting a strong objection from William Schulz, executive director of Amnesty International USA.

A State Department official, who briefed reporters on condition of anonymity, said 16 Colombian military personnel have been suspended for human rights violations in recent months, including six officers.

Twenty-nine others were dismissed for trying to cover up the deaths of two civilians.

In addition, he said, a Colombian general, Rodrigo Quinones, was removed from his command based on allegations that he did nothing to prevent the massacre of 21 civilians by a paramilitary unit.

The official said a second massacre in which Quinones has been implicated involved the deaths of 27 civilians.

As for the paramilitary units, known by their Spanish initials AUC, the official said 416 members were arrested during the first eight months of this year compared with 590 in all of 2001.

He said another 160 others were killed in combat.

The AUC, considered a terrorist organization by Washington, is made up of militias that are accused of carrying out most of the massacres in Colombia's bloody civil war.

Their links with the Colombian military have been a sore point here for years, particularly among human rights groups.

Schulz said the ties between the AUC and the Colombian military still persist.

Salina adds more flight regulations

Aviation department takes steps to heed FAA recommendation

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sept. 11 affects K-State-Salina operations every day.

Marlon Johnston, aviation department head, said K-State-Salina has taken an incremental approach in adding more regulations to flight policies.

The Federal Aviation Administration and the government regulate the major airlines, Johnston said, and they've worked to improve security measures such as baggage checks.

K-State-Salina falls under the category of a general aviation operation because its planes weigh less than 12,500 pounds, Johnston said.

The FAA has not mandated any policies for aircraft that fall below this point, but has advised the campus to take action.

"So far we've taken to heart the advisories of the FAA, even if we've been unaffected," Johnston said. "We do have an enhanced security level."

Part of K-State-Salina's security includes an electronic card swipe system, but it was already in place before the attacks, he said.

"We've expanded the system to include more flight facilities," he said. "It's just another step to improve the security level."

Flight maintenance students, faculty and workers now have a standard shirt for quick identification, Johnston said. He said they understand the importance of increasing awareness for overall security.

"We want to give a full picture to our students of this industry," Johnston said. "Pilots aren't the only ones who wear uniforms."

Johnston said another change K-State-Salina implemented follows the FAA's guidance of not accepting flight ratings from international sources.

"International students will now have to complete some hours at school here," he said. "We won't just be accepting everything now. But that hasn't affected us here very much."

Barney King, professional pilot section head, said security has tightened considerably following the attacks. However, he said a post-Sept. 11 visit by the FAA didn't require a lot of response on K-State-Salina's part.

"I think what the FAA visit revealed is that we're doing a solid job," King said. "We've also added a section in our policies to cover security now."

King said K-State-Salina requires all students flying planes to fly with an instructor. He al-

Terror alert raised for 9/11

Ft. Riley soldiers take measures for potential repeat attacks

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The United States was moved to a heightened state of alert on Tuesday in response to threats of potential attacks planned for today. The nation declared a code orange, the second-highest alert status.

Christie Vanover, Fort Riley's deputy media relations officer, said she cannot disclose Tuesday's exact level of alert for the base, but she said it definitely had heightened its security.

Vanover said that while most results of changes in alert level will not be apparent to the public, people will notice a change in the appearances of soldiers, who will be wearing more combat equipment.

Although she said she was not allowed to discuss how long this heightened security level will be in effect, Vanover said members of the public will be able to use soldiers' attire as a guide to make their own determinations.

Bush announces increased security at home, abroad

By Ron Fournier
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — The Bush administration raised the nationwide terror alert to its second highest level, closed nine U.S. embassies overseas and heightened security at federal buildings and landmarks in America as new intelligence warned of car bombings, suicide attacks and other strikes linked to the Sept. 11 anniversary.

Americans were urged Tuesday to be alert but unbowed — go to work, to school and on trips — despite specific threats against U.S. interests abroad and less credible concerns that terrorists might attack America again.

"The threats that we have heard recently remind us of the pattern of threats we heard prior to September the 11th," President Bush said on the eve of the anniversary. "We have no specific threat to America, but we're taking everything seriously."

Despite West Nile concerns, American Red Cross receives plenty of support for local blood drive

By Tara Patty
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Despite uncertainties regarding the West Nile virus, donor estimates are high for the American Red Cross Blood Drive today at Manhattan Town Center.

The West Nile Virus is a concern to the organization because of the recent death of an organ recipient in Atlanta, Ga., who contracted the virus, said Bree Cox, communications specialist for Central Plains Region Blood Services. Although experts still are trying to determine if the virus was contracted through the blood transfusion or the organ dona-

"We're working with the CDC to see if it was the blood transfusions or organ donation that transferred the virus," Cox said. "If it was the transfusion, it's important to note that the West Nile virus is not necessarily fatal."

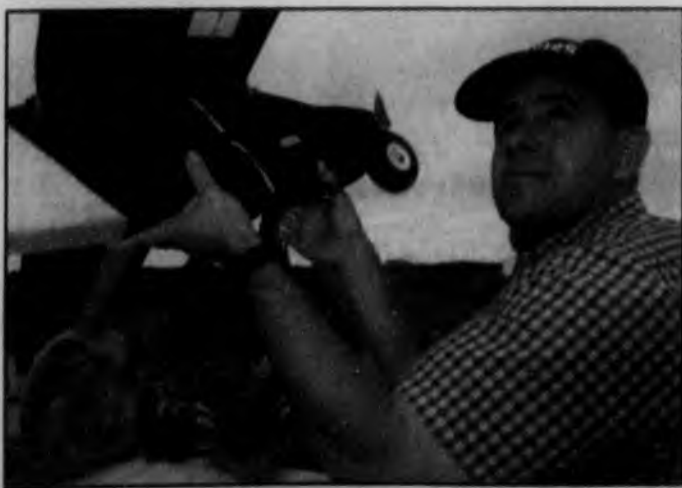

No confirmed cases of West Nile virus have been contract-

The American Red Cross surpassed their goal of 140 pints Tuesday. With one pint of blood per donor, they reached a total of 148 bags. The blood drive will continue today in the Manhattan Town Center.

Elementary schools experience science at Field Day

Agriculture introduced to Manhattan children by live demonstrations

By Shannon Hartenstein
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Agriculture is more than farming — it's a science. That's what more than 200 fourth-through-sixth-grade pupils learned Tuesday at the third annual Elementary School Agronomy Field Day.

Pupils visited the Agronomy Research Farm on Kimball Avenue to learn about technology, crops, soil, wind and water at 11 interactive stations, Jim Shroyer, extension agronomist, said. Pupils from nine classes at Marlatt, Frank Bergman, Theodore Roosevelt and Lee elementary schools attended.

The event helped introduce agriculture to pupils from urban areas or without agricultural backgrounds, he said.

"About 2 percent of the nation's population is involved in production agriculture. Where are our researchers going to come from in the future?" Shroyer said. "With that few people associated with production agriculture, the city kids are going to be working in agricultural sciences. This is a way to whet their appetites."

Exhibits helped pupils understand agricultural science and technology.

A wind tunnel and rainfall simulator showed the importance of crop residue in minimizing wind and water erosion in fields. Other exhibits taught about common Kansas weeds and how pioneers used them.

Attendees also learned how to build a compost pile and why compost is important, how soil layers are formed and which minerals are present in each layer, and how crops from around the world are used in common food products, Shroyer said.

Another exhibit, "The Living Soil," let pupils view through microscopes the tiny organisms that make the soil "alive," he said.

The quarter-scale tractor team taught about using energy, power and mechanics with a tractor-pull demonstration.

NEWSWORTHY

The Associated Press

President Bush said Tuesday he will ask the United Nations "to deal with the problem" of Iraq and dispatched top members of his national security team to Capitol Hill to talk to skeptical lawmakers. Bush connected his goal of toppling Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to the war on terror he began after the Sept. 11 attacks last year.

U.N. chief arms inspector Hans Blix said there was no evidence that Iraq has weapons of mass destruction or is trying to build them. However, he urged Iraq to allow U.N. inspectors back and said that if Baghdad cooperated fully with inspections he could recommend that the Security Council suspend sanctions.

Homeland security bill debates slowed to a crawl Tuesday, as moderate senators searched for a compromise on the rights of the estimated 170,000 workers expected to join the proposed Cabinet agency. Senate debate on the bill halted Tuesday as lawmakers paused for the anniversary of the Sept. 11 attacks.

The United States Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review met Monday to review a Justice Department request to use espionage wiretaps. Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee squabbled over how the department interpreted the changes Congress made in wiretap laws after Sept. 11.

BANTER AND BELLOW | Fortune cookies

Cookies provide fuel for debate even if messages are too vague

Gross cookies taste like voodoo
Fortune cookies are supposed to predict the future, but the last hunk of unleavened cardboard I got told me the following: "The road to happiness is long."
Oh, really? Wow, that's almost as deep as the lyrics to any country song.
I thought fortune cookies were supposed to have some deep philosophical significance or at least give me something worth pondering while I chew on the shards of plaster the message is wrapped in.
The next cookie I get should darn-well give me some useful information. Fortune cookies should tell me I will wear a hat tomorrow, or that traffic will be at full tilt three hours before the sun sets.
They should predict occurrences that will urge me to look forward to tomorrow, such as, "Layton, that super-fly hot and steamy blonde who sits behind you in class will ask for your digits on Wednesday."
That sure would be nice.
The cookies also have lotto numbers on the back. Why?
I'd love to see some idiot dash down to the nearest gas station to play the lottery because of what a vapid little cookie told him. Who would actually believe this rubbish?
Dunderheads who drag around crystal balls, magical quartz, rabbits' feet and snake oil are the ones who believe fortune cookies. They are the clowns who can name every astrological sign and moon subdivision and can tell me what color my aura is.
They might as well have names for their boogers, too.
If you think you're a witch or if Miss Cleo is your hero, you should take your Ouija board and stick it. If you don't know where to stick it, then call Miss Cleo.
She ought to know.

More fun than foresight
Who knows what the future holds? One crack and a few crumbs later, I can rest in comfort knowing that both my belly and my mind are full of wisdom and foresight.
Nothing tops off a Chinese, Taiwanese or Mongolian buffet like those little, processed, plastic-wrapped treats: fortune cookies.
Not only do they soothe my sugar habit, but they also feed my desire to discover the meaning of life — or at least learn my lucky numbers, if I ever decide to waste a buck on a lottery ticket.
I'll admit that fortune cookies have changed. They used to be more concrete. But their new-found, vague quipiness only adds to the mystery. What do the Powers That Be mean when they tell me, "Good friends are a treasure to hold near?"
Perhaps I'll meet a new friend. Or maybe — and this would be better — one will give me lots of money, or gold coins. I'd be sure to hold those super-close.
As the song says, "I believe in magic." Now, it's easy to write off the song — and fortune cookies — as dorky, but you have to admit, that's a catchy tune. It's the kind of thing that puts a skip in your step and a smile on your face.
That's exactly what a newsgirl like myself needs. There's nothing like a horoscope or a crazy book on Virgo romances to make me forget about all the murders and conflict I read about each day.
Like on Tuesday. My moon was in Scorpio, so my emotions were supposed to be passionate yet controlled. Knowing this, I worked to communicate with others patiently, not irrationally.
OK, that's not true. But I still think I fit the Virgo profile. And horoscopes can be so romantic and dramatic, it's kind of fun.
And that, my friends, is the real magic of fortune, fate and the future.

Local stores offer back-to-school supplies, competition

Prices affordable despite outsourcing, chain discounting

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Manhattan school supply market is facing changes because of Varney's ownership of the K-State Union Bookstore.

Jeff Levin, store manager of Varney's, and his brother, Steve Levin, store manager of the Union Bookstore, said they are both trying to keep prices low to help students.

"We're a family-owned business," Jeff Levin said. "We went to school here, and we try to keep prices comparable to the marketplace."

Overall, Jeff Levin said he does not think prices at either bookstore have gone up.

"We have actually reduced the margin on textbook prices, because we have been able to purchase a lot more used books," he said.

"Any price increases are because the manufacturers have increased their prices."

Jeff Levin also said prices are one of Varney's main concerns.

"We know that prices are a big factor for students in deciding where to shop, and we try to stay competitive," he said.

Steve Levin said the Union store is trying to offer a wider variety of items.

"We are trying to get a lot more merchandise for students," he said.

"We have the K-State T-shirts for $9.99 this year and things like that."

Wal-Mart Store Manager Roy Hullett said he thinks

Price comparison

	12 Bic Pens	3-ring binder	Looseleaf paper
Staples	$1.55	$1.99	$0.34
Wal-Mart	$1.28	$0.68	$0.97
Varney's	$2.25	$1.69	$0.99

Wal-Mart prices are definitely staying competitive.

"It seems like every year we get more and more competitive," he said. "For example, this year we sold five bottles of glue for a dollar, and in the past it has been three for a dollar."

Hullett said Wal-Mart is always looking for new ways to offer low-cost merchandise to customers.

"The biggest new thing for us this year is Wal-Mart Online," Hullett said.

"We offer over 300,000 textbooks online and we think that is a big advantage for a college student."

Dan Christian, sales manager at Staples, said prices at his store are basically the same as in previous years.

"Some of our prices have gone up a little, but others have gone down a little," Christian said.

"A lot of the main things like pencils, paper and notebooks are pretty close to the same prices."

Staples also is offering more networking modem devices this year, Christian said.

"It is a big draw for the students," he said.

"We have tried to get as much of that type of thing in as we can."

Christian said Staples is keeping up with technology as K-State offers wireless Internet connections.

"With all of the different places on campus going to wireless Internet technology, we have tried to carry that merchandise as well," he said.

Union Governing Board discusses bookstore outsourcing response

Students content with changes to bookstore; new features in works

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Union Governing Board discussed the transition to outsourcing the K-State Student Union Bookstore to Varney's Book Store at its meeting Tuesday.

"We feel very good with the move," Bernard Pitts, director of the Union said. "It was a very difficult choice to make, but I think it has been for the better for our students."

Steve Levin, manager of the Union Bookstore, said Varney's has been well received and has kept all employees who wanted to remain. Also, he said, they added several student-worker positions and extended working hours.

So far, he said, the process has run smoothly.

"The books were here, the lines were quicker - if there were any - and sales were up," Levin said.

Varney's added several features to the store, he said. These include dry-clean pick up, Digital Shelf DVD rental service, an art table and a pick up point for film to be taken to Wolfe's Camera and Video in Topeka.

Levin said they will begin a delivery service for the movie rentals, along with pizza delivery.

However, because the Union chose to outsource to a for-profit group, the Educational Charge Account Program will end. The program allowed students who had not yet received their financial aid to purchase books and put the cost on a charge card. Once their aid came in, they paid it back.

The university helped cover the cost, but because Varney's is for-profit, neither K-State nor the state can accommodate the program. Pitts said the Union has a pool of money to continue the voucher program this fall and spring, but then the program will cease.

Todd Kohman, board member and student body vice president, said he knows that some students depend on this to buy books, but said that the move was beneficial to students.

"For what we got out of the deal, I think it's one of the best decisions the Union's made fically since I've been here," Kohman said.

To help with the transition, books are offered at a lower price at the Union Bookstore than Varney's, he said. Varney's will also donate .025 percent of its net sales to scholarships for Union student employees.

"There's a lot of negative spin of Varney's taking over, like there's a mysterious monopoly, but the students are really making out better," Kohman said.

Also at the meeting, the board ruled to allow the distribution of the Liberty Press at the Union.

The weekly publication is aimed at the bisexual, lesbian, gay and transgender communities. It contains letters, articles and lists of events and activities of interest.

"This is a very good publication to the BLGT population who might not have any access to this information otherwise," Jeff Powell, representative of Queer & Straight Alliance, said.

The board also approved the donation of about 3,000 textbooks, roughly 50 titles, to Alabama State University instead of selling them. The books were purchased during buyback, and then not used again by professors. The bookstore kept the titles so they could be counted as assets during financially tough years, but when Varney's moved in, they did not want to keep them.

"The value of the information of the books would be much better in the hands of students at another university," Levin said.

In other discussion, Pitts said which projects were completed due to the $600,000 the Privilege Fee Committee allocated to the Union last spring. Pitts said they purchased a new freight elevator and new banquet chairs for the ballroom and catering rooms. The exterior doors at the east and north entrances also were replaced.

Other projects will be brought before the board throughout the year, Pitts said.

"We have a priority list we are using," he said. "We'll probably spend the entire $600,000 this year."

TO THE POINT 9/11 coverage an essential part of journalism

In the months preceding Sept. 11, the media had little more to focus on than shark attacks and politician scandals.

But that fateful day last year turned the journalism world upside down.

Everything reporters knew about news coverage changed.

Only a few events in the past 40 years have required journalists to reflect on the role they play in society.

These events cause the public to criticize the media for what seems to be never-ending coverage. Too often, the press is shunned for "beating a dead horse."

Thorough coverage, however, is the media's job. In any story, all angles must be addressed. If we, the media, miss even one, we fail to meet the objective presented to us the moment we signed on as journalists.

We are not over-sensationalizing, rather, we are investigating.

Media members also need to be on a heightened alert during times of crisis. We cannot ignore situations that could affect the entire world.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Would you like cheese with that whine?

Students should maintain positive outlook regarding upgrades, change

Each fall semester provokes the same response from students: whining about all the changes that happened during the summer.

But change is not a bad thing.

Take, for instance, the new alumni center. It is a beautiful building. Its construction was finished before classes started.

The people working there gave out ice cream at the Wildcat Welcome for crying out loud.

What's not to love?

Despite the center's nearly innumerable good qualities, many students don't like it.

They whine about its location. "Just think of the parking we could have put there," some lament. My response to them is, "With whose money, fat-hat? The center was built with private donations. No alumni are going to donate money to solve our petty parking problems!"

It does, however, make a lot of sense for K-State supporters to donate in order to increase alumni support. As the recipient of a foundation scholarship, I'm pretty stinkin' glad they built that center. It will eventually enable more people to attend this fine academic institution whose volleyball team totally rocks.

Whining makes people forget about the nice things other people have done for them.

I never hear anyone

MICAH HAWKINSON

thanking alumni for finally doing something about that eyesore corner. I haven't heard a word of gratitude for the improvements that Alumni Association money helped make to Memorial Stadium.

Nope, it's just whine, whine, complain and whine some more. The stadium isn't the only change students haven't been enthusiastic about.

Let me tell you,

I have never heard so much belly-aching about anything as I have about Varney's Book Store taking over management of the K-State Student Union Bookstore.

"It's a monopoly," say the sheep. "Prices will go up!" These people need to get off the whaamulance for a second and assess the situation with level heads.

The main effects of the management switch have been beneficial. Students have been able to get their books more quickly and efficiently.

Instead of getting shuffled back and forth between stores, customers can find out the real story about their books and why they're not here yet.

And the contract Varney's has with the Union will ensure that prices at both stores stay reasonable, according to Bernard Pitts, Union executive director.

Why all the whining? People are pretty conservative. They don't like to see a lot of change within a short period of time. When they do, they freak out. Then, they start doing the only thing they can to try repairing reality: they whine and wish things hadn't changed.

The problem with this line of thinking is that change tends to be pretty good for everyone. You don't change something that works.

This means that, ideally, the only stuff that gets changed already has problems.

It is good to debate changes. Everyone should be able to give input about things that will affect their lives. But once a decision is made and the change is complete, the only thing that really makes a difference is how you respond to the change.

You could choose, like some on our fair campus, to respond negatively to change. Go ahead - naysay, pooh-pooh, whine, bicker.

Or you could accept the changes. You could react to challenges in a productive and thoughtful way. Heck, maybe if you tried hard enough, you could even learn to go the right way down Moro Street.

Then again, not even a positive attitude can work miracles.

Students need to learn by Golden Rule

Instructors deserve class attention; latecomers, early leavers should study lessons of respect

"I hope the faculty realizes that without the students, they would not have a job. They should start treating the students with respect."

It's Campus Fourum comments like this that make me want to throw down on the Rodney Dangerfield impersonators screaming about not getting any respect.

Yes, professors need to respect students, but what about students respecting the professors?

Students have to appreciate their instructors before they can expect to earn the same in return.

But that doesn't always happen. Arriving late to class, babbling on and on about the best beer for tailgating parties, receiving cell-phone calls and packing it up early are just a few of the countless indications of the lack of respect in the teacher-student relationship.

AMBER KOEHN

Yet in the midst of all these disparagements, professors have to continue educating their pupils to the best of their abilities.

Sometimes those abilities are pretty great.

When students arrive late to class, they interrupt entire lessons. The instructors have to pause their lectures and sometimes reiterate their previous points because the entire class is distracted.

However, students sometimes cannot avoid coming in late. If this is the case, they should arrive in a quiet manner and sit toward the back of the room so they disturb as few people as possible.

This does not include explaining why they're late to anyone willing to listen. That just delays class even more.

Students also seem to consider it important to know every detail about what their friends did the past weekend. True, it might be helpful to know which football player looks the best in those tight pants, but couldn't that wait until after class?

The diverse tunes of cell-phone ringers also can wait until after the lessons end. If people can't wait a couple of hours before contacting their friends, then they need to seek professional help for being too dependent on technological advances.

But the disrespect does not stop there.

Something all too common among college students is the insane rush to leave their classes as soon as possible. If they want to skedaddle so badly, why are they even here?

I can definitely think of better ways to waste money.

It's just plain rude to be shuffling papers and zipping up bags when professors are still in the middle of their lectures.

There are times and places to socialize, but class is not one of them. Students are here to learn, not have that process interrupted by Suzie Q. discussing her latest failed relationship while her professor lectures about punnett squares.

If students want respect from their professors, they should be willing to dish out some of that lovin' in return.

Students are paying to hear instructors' words of wisdom, so they should at least listen to what the faculty has to say.

After all, they just might fulfill the goal of attending college and learn something.

Hey, Nasrina, if I were to go to Cabaret U.S.A., would that be the appropriate place to make these kind of comments towards girls?

Yeah, if Zac Cook is running the entire show at K-State, I'm transferring.

I'm proud to be an American.

God bless the U.S.A.

Nasrina Burnett is just jealous that she wasn't getting the cat-calls on campus, unlike that very voluptuous vixen who was.

Hey, Nasrina, you're pretty hot. Can I have your number?

Girls, what is it about frat boys you find so appealing? Let's face it - all they want to do is get your underwear off. Why don't you get with somebody who will respect you?

Yeah, Lewis Black, I'm a huge fan of his, but there is no way I'm going to pay 11 bucks to see him.

Gov. Graves does not read the paper, so quit calling the Fourum and leaving a message for him.

Here's a little something for the business majors: Everyone's got the right to be stupid, but some people just abuse the privilege.

TO THE EDITOR

University's decision to sell KKSU airtime to WIBW eliminates part of history; K-State's lack of research to blame for allowing institution's run come to end

Editor,

Many think of historic preservation only in terms of buildings. But historic preservation also can deal with intangible things - such as the way we act - that are as much a part of our "roots" as are buildings.

The news of late reports the out-of-court settlement between K-State and WIBW radio over rights to broadcast K-State football games. Someone obviously did not do his homework and sold the Mid-America Ag Network exclusive rights to broadcast K-State games for the next five years - for $6 million - overlooking the fact that a 1969 contract gave WIBW radio the right to broadcast football games.

Part of the settlement is that WIBW gets to buy - for $1.5 million - the right to take over all of the AM 580 frequency, now used five hours each day by KKSU.

What most people do not realize is that AM 580 was K-State's frequency, acquired in 1924, which the university later allowed WIBW to use, not vice versa.

Not long ago I read an article about KKSU being one of the last, if not the last, of the student radio stations in the United States sharing a frequency with another station - a fairly common phenomenon in the early days of broadcasting.

I took some pride in the fact that for years, K-State has resisted WIBW's pressures to sell its remaining rights to KKSU.

Unfortunately, WIBW used this debacle to force K-State into a settlement on WIBW's terms.

The KKSU, originally KSAC, broadcasts have been a kind of "living history," carrying on the tradition of shared-frequency broadcasting while fulfilling a role in educating student broadcasters. That is now to be relegated to the dustbin of history, and future generations will not be able to experience it.

They will have to read about it in the history books.

Ironically, other recent news accounts report a massive program being undertaken to protect the Topeka shiner, a small minnow found in many eastern Kansas streams, declared to be an endangered species.

Unfortunately, no one came forward to save shared-radio frequency broadcasting from outright extinction, and a 78-year epoch of K-State broadcasting on AM 580 will soon come to a close.

And we will be the less for it.

Local songwriter Justin Hulsey packs up acoustic guitar, moves to Nashville

By Ashley Huseman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Moving to Nashville can be a daunting task, and many songwriters return from the musical promised land empty-handed — or worse.

After three weeks, the country capital of the world still has some work to do if it will stifle Manhattan singer-songwriter Justin Hulsey's optimism.

"Things are going really well for only being here a couple of weeks," Hulsey said. "I miss Manhattan like crazy. I didn't want to leave, but sometimes you just have to."

After the release of his second album, "Running Upon the Wires," which came out in July, Hulsey, 21 years old, decided it was time to make the move to Nashville in hopes of making connections and furthering his music career.

For Hulsey, the mental aspect of leaving his comfort zone in Kansas was the hardest part of deciding to move. However, he says he feels like he is supposed to be there and will make the best of it.

Hulsey said he isn't the least bit worried about what will happen if things don't work out in Nashville. He is there because he loves to play.

After attending K-State for 3 years as an English major, Hulsey said he doesn't plan on going back to school unless he is left with no other options.

"I'm going to make it work out," he said. "It's not about making it big. It's just about playing."

So far, Hulsey has been singing in booked performances and at the few open-mic nights available. In Manhattan and the surrounding area, open mics are set up for any artist who wants to be heard. But in Nashville, many times, if you don't get booked, you don't play.

Despite the limited venues he can play, Hulsey said he has kept himself busy working on an idea for a new album. He is also spending plenty of time writing.

"I have 14 songs ready to record, but it will be a different process from the last album I recorded, because it won't be as polished-sounding," he said. "My new stuff sounds more acoustic-folk."

The production of "Running Upon the Wires" turned out to be an educational experience for both Hulsey and its producer, Ty Kasper. Kasper helped Hulsey achieve the slick sound on the album and said his work wasn't planned, but he was glad it happened.

"This was the first album I had ever recorded, and Justin was kind of going out on a limb with me," Kasper said.

Hulsey said he only planned on recording a demo, but before it was all over, he had recorded a full album with 10 songs. Typically, Hulsey performs without a band, but for this album he worked with the Wichita band Applewood.

"The whole process went really well," Hulsey said. "It was really good to work with a band, and we were able to produce a really clean album."

Kasper said Hulsey is a mature songwriter, and with any luck, he'll have a bright future ahead.

"It will do the world good to have more songwriters like him," Kasper said. "He's a very honest, passionate writer. I really respect the fact that Justin doesn't like to tell people what he thinks his songs are about because he wants people to find their own meaning."

Kasper added that one of Hulsey's strong points is the unique approach he takes to the guitar.

"I think he is amazing," Kasper said. "He sees the guitar differently than a lot of people do. He sees it in seven or eight different tunings and takes songs from that. His approach to guitar playing is different than anyone else's, and it just blows me away."

Hulsey's recent performances in Manhattan have been at Auntie Mae's Parlor and 12th St. Pub, but his very first performance was at The Lighthouse when he was only a junior in high school.

The Lighthouse, a three-story house occupied by Christian college students, was where events such as poetry readings and performances happened. At the time, Hulsey said this first show seemed like a big accomplishment because he had to play for an older audience.

Hulsey said songwriting has intrigued him ever since he started playing the guitar. He immediately had the desire to write songs because he was fascinated with writing.

"Music is the only constant thing that has pushed me," Hulsey said. "I get a feeling and just have to write. It's a passion."

Hulsey keeps the focus on his lyrics to concentrate on good, honest writing, he said.

"My goal is to be honest with what I say," Hulsey said. "It's about telling things from my point of view, and a lot of it is therapy."

Though his parents have always supported his passion for music, they never pushed him into playing. Hulsey said there was no one in particular who helped him get where he is today, though he was a Pearl Jam fan while growing up and was influenced by Jackson Brown.

He said he is independent, and music always has been something he has done on his own. Hulsey writes with hopes that everyone can gain something different from listening to his music.

"I hope people can listen to my songs and apply them to their own lives," Hulsey said. "It's like reading a book. Everyone will probably get something different out of it."

William H. Macy was honored with the 2002 Boston Film Excellence Award as part of the Boston Film Festival.

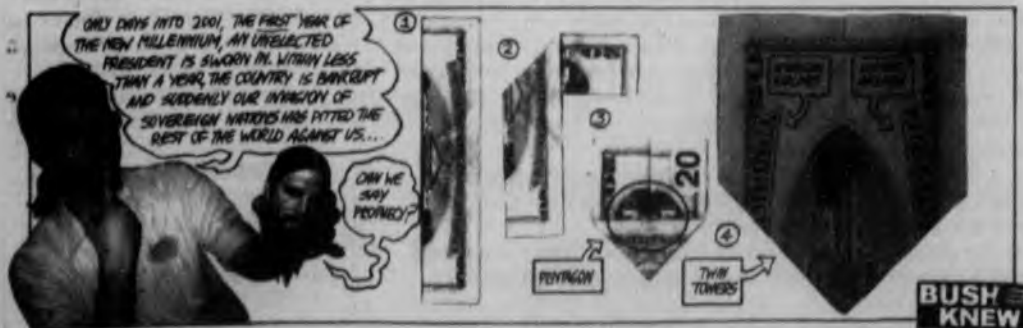

The 52-year-old actor received a crystal vase Monday night before a packed auditorium of about 320 people at Loews Boston Common theater, where his latest movie, "Welcome to Collinwood," was shown.

"Welcome to Collinwood" is about an ensemble of lowlifes pursuing the perfect heist. Macy plays a single father who has trouble finding a baby sitter so he can help pull off the job.

Golf team finishes 3rd in Nebraska

Watkins fires final-round 78 to finish 8th overall

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team began the 2002 season just as they did last year, finishing in third place at the Fairway Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

Windy conditions in Tuesday's third round hurt the team's play, but the Wildcats finished with a 32-over par 884 as a team, tied with Illinois State University.

"Obviously, it's not how we wanted to finish," Coach Tim Norris said.

"It was a tough day. The wind shifted 180 degrees, so it was a completely different course."

The par-71, 6,762-yard Firethorn Golf Course offered a challenge for all K-State players, but Norris said he likes what it can tell him about his team.

"It's a tough course," he said. "The reason I like going up there is it gives you a pretty good idea of what you need to work on. A missed shot will cost you double-bogey or worse, and we did a pretty good job of staying away from that."

Aaron Watkins found himself in a tie for first place after the first two rounds Monday, with a 1-under par 70 in the first round, and a 2-under par 69 in the second round. Watkins struggled with the conditions in the final round on Tuesday, as he finished with a 7-over par 78, tied for eighth place.

"I was excited about Aaron's chance," coach Norris said. "He didn't have a good day, but I'm excited about the kind of year he can have."

Watkins also had the pressure of playing in the final group, something coach Norris saw as a tough challenge for the junior from Mesa, Ariz.

"Aaron's getting better and better," Norris said. "It was a challenge for him in the final group. He was paired with the guy that was tied with him and the guy who was a stroke behind him after the first day. Bad days happen and he'll learn from that."

A.J. Elgert, a junior from Lincoln, carded a disappointing 10-over 223 for the two-day event, a tournament that in 2001 Elgert tied for third place, including a career best 68 during the second round of the Fairway Club Invitational.

Joining Elgert in a tie for 17th were teammates Greg Douglas and Josh Persons.

"Josh played really, really good," Norris said. "He had some shots he could have saved each round, but he'll learn how to do that in the future."

"He's a really good player," he said. "I don't want to say he's the most talented freshman that we've had since I've been here because that remains to be seen. Certainly, he has all the tools, and that's what I like about him."

Persons, a freshman from Fargo, N.D., competed in his first tournament as a Wildcat along with sophomore transfer Matt Van Cleave.

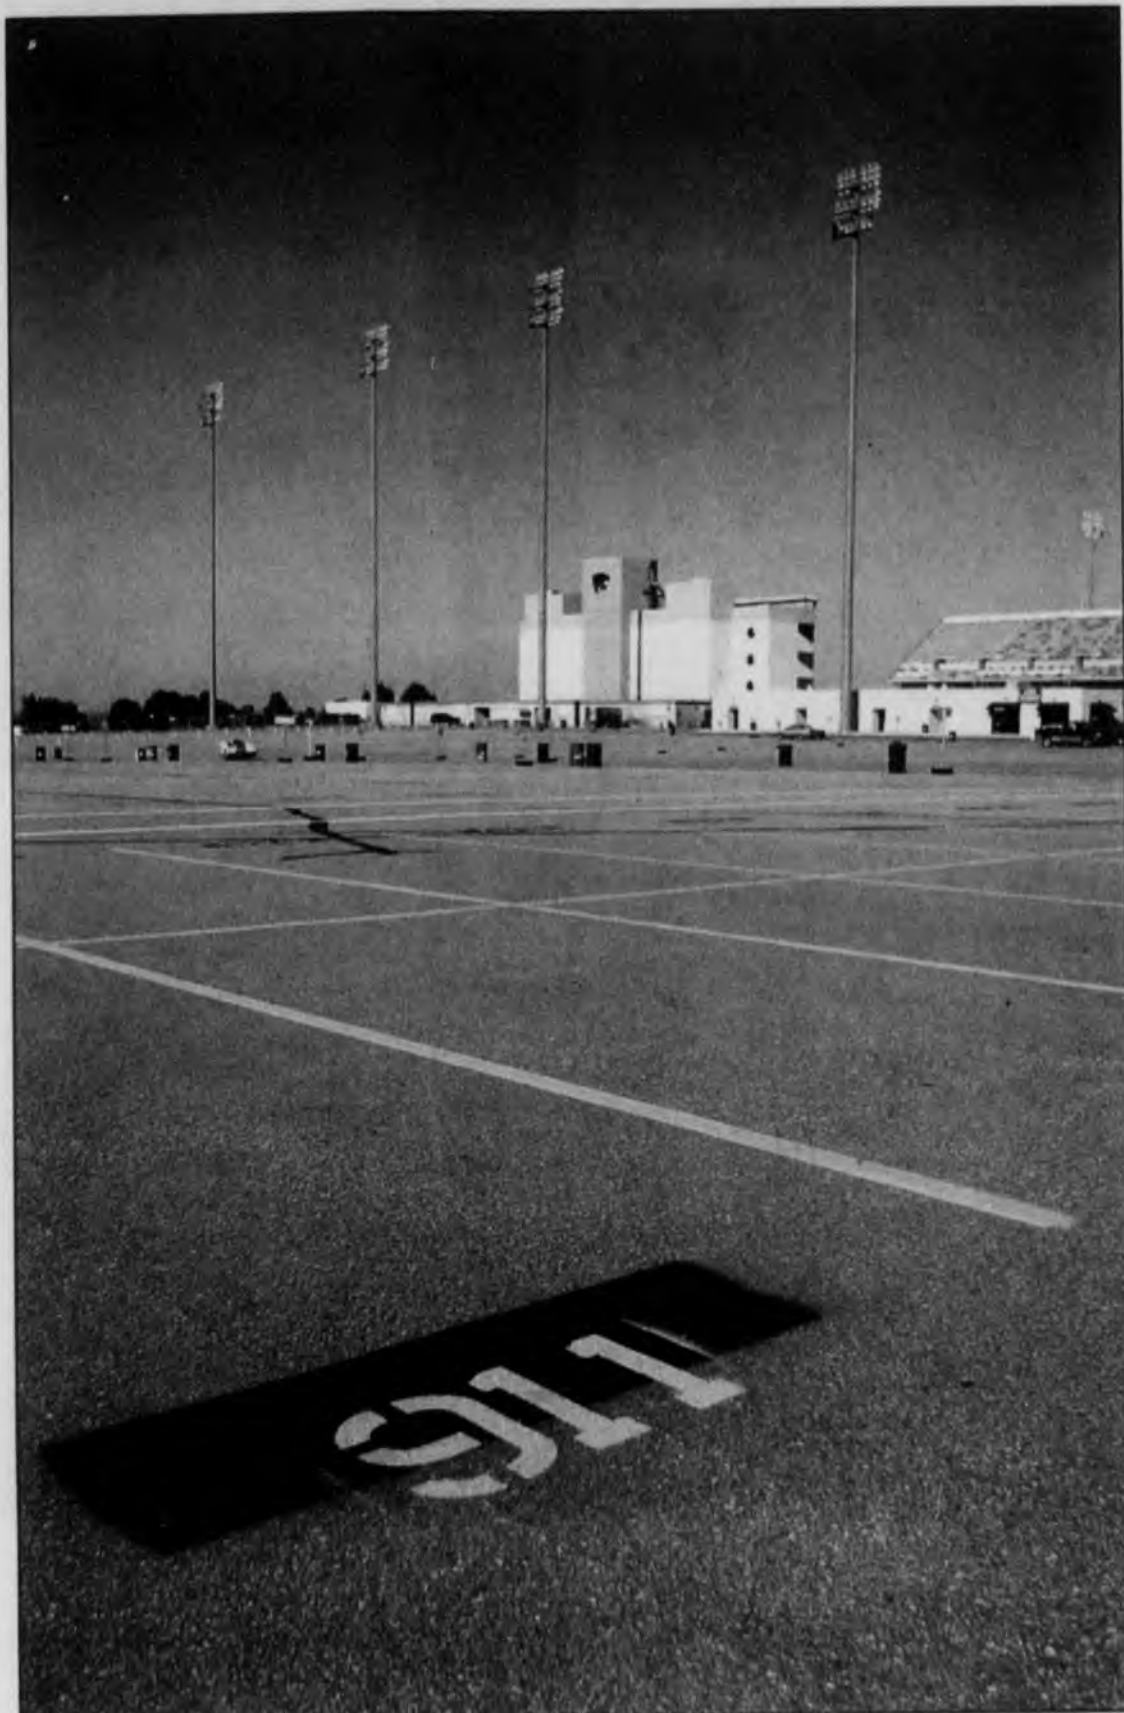

Van Cleave finished the Invitational at 228, tied for 37th place.

"We played well as a team," Norris said. "We were pretty solid one through five, and every time somebody faltered, somebody picked up the slack. Top to bottom, I was pretty pleased. But you always have to be a little apprehensive in the first tournament of the year."

The Wildcats next action is in Toledo, Ohio, at the Inverness Invitational on Sept. 16-17.

Because of the Sept. 11 events, K-State's football game with Louisiana Tech was canceled last year.

One year ago, sports paused to pay tribute

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Exactly one year ago, the sports world stood still.

National pastimes were put on hold Sept. 11 as the nation mourned the loss of fellow Americans.

Major League Baseball shut down its offices for nearly a week, the National Football League took a week to remember the events in New York, and K-State postponed its athletic events as well — a decision that was a no-brainer for Wildcat coaches.

"I think sports should take a back seat at this time," volleyball coach Suzie Fritz said on Sept. 11 last year. "This is a world crisis, and as an American, it really makes you think about some things."

The volleyball team de-played matches against Nebraska (scheduled for Sept. 12) and Texas A&M (scheduled for Sept. 15) in accordance with the Big 12 Conference's decision to postpone all league games for the rest of that week.

"This is the most tragic event most people have ever seen," Fritz said before the decision was made to postpone matches. "Whether or not we play volleyball is not the most important thing right now."

"Everyone is affected by these tragic events."

Whether or to play college games was a back-and-forth decision.

Big 12 football officials first ruled that games would be played that Saturday but then decided against it the

Athletes, fans understand importance of showing patriotism

It's been a year already. Today, Americans remember what we lost that day and how, in that loss, we found the strength to act as a nation.

The sporting community remembers as well.

As a sportswriter and devoted fan, athletics are as much a fixture in my life as anything. Daily, I attempt to divide my time between my family, my ridiculously attractive girlfriend, school and my athletic interests.

I sit through three-hour baseball games, press conferences, golf, football, basketball and generally whatever I can find on ESPN and the big networks, always looking for something to hold onto.

I live for the moment in a game when everything is on the line. When, in an instant, dreams are realized. When men and women can be changed forever, when something done on the playing field or court or mat can be burned into someone's memory for a lifetime.

It's poetry in real time. And perhaps in all my life I've never been so moved by sports than I was in the weeks and months that followed Sept.

11, during a time when the ills of that terrible act were burned into our society's consciousness forever.

There were so many images. There was the tattered American flag, rescued from the rubble of the WTC, being flown in Yankee Stadium as thousands of people held back tears — or couldn't — as their voices came together for the "Star Spangled Banner" at the World Series.

Tributes took place in ceremonies before games of all kinds, at every level of sports, from high school to the pros.

There was red, white and blue everywhere. Stars and stripes appeared emblazoned on jerseys, on football helmets, on playing fields and on flags in the hands of the people who found respite from what that horrible day could come to mean, in the stadiums of our nation.

Sammy Sosa, running at full tilt near the ivy-covered wall of Wrigley Field, a modern-day superman, brandished the American flag before the adoring cheers of the people of Chicago.

And so here we are. Sports in America have changed forever — their places in people's lives, and in my own, have been put in a new perspective. They are less at the forefront of our attention. Now, they are second to our loved ones and to the resolves that make our country such a fitting cause to fight for.

They are, perhaps as never before, a symbol of the freedoms and comforts we lucky people enjoy.

NCAA | Ochs to miss two games

Colorado coach Gary Barnett believes his concussion-plagued quarterback, Craig Ochs, will miss the next two games but be recovered to play on Oct. 5 against K-State.

Ochs underwent four hours of neurological examinations on Monday and had further tests on Tuesday.

Ochs, a 21-year-old junior, departed at halftime of Saturday night's 34-14 win over San Diego with his third concussion in the past year. He also had a concussion in high school.

Boxing | Can't they just get along

The fight is billed as "Bad Blood," and sure enough there were a pair of plexiglass screens to separate Oscar De La Hoya and Fernando Vargas in case either of them got out of hand at Tuesday's final pre-fight news conference.

They needn't have bothered.

There was no pushing, no shoving, no trash talking. There was little, in fact, to indicate either 154-pound champion had a problem with the other.

"I don't dislike anyone," De La Hoya said. "It's not in my nature."

The scene was quite different from a January press conference announcing the fight, when the two boxers shoved each other and exchanged words.

Eight months later, Vargas wouldn't even say why he hates his hometown rival so much.

"We'll talk about it after the fight," Vargas said.

1987 — New York Mets third baseman Howard Johnson, with 34 homers, became the first NL infielder ever to reach 30 home runs and 30 stolen bases in the same season. His 30th stolen base came in the fourth inning of a 6-4, 10-inning loss to the St. Louis Cardinals.

K-State | Women's basketball team No. 3 in Slam Magazine

The K-State women's basketball team received its first preseason ranking of the 2002-03 season Tuesday by being ranked No. 3 by SLAM Magazine, the monthly basketball-only magazine, in its Women's Preseason Top 10 Poll. That poll, along with the men's preseason predictions, will be included in the newest issue of SLAM Magazine, which goes on sale on Tuesday, Sept. 17.

The ranking was the first preseason acknowledgement by a national organization since K-State was ranked No. 9 in the 1984 Associated Press Women's Preseason Poll.

The Wildcats were behind No. 1 Duke and No. 2 Tennessee, and are one of three Big 12 teams ranked in the top 10. Rounding out the top 10 is No. 4 Texas, No. 5 Connecticut, No. 6 Georgia, No. 7 Purdue, No. 8 Louisiana State, No. 9 Texas Tech and No. 10 Stanford.

SALINA | Aviation department increases security, flights restricted

so said student pilots are not allowed to have keys.

"These policies, I think, make sense. Student pilots shouldn't have keys, and we're very concerned about safety," he said.

Adam Steichen, senior in aviation, said that after the Sept. 11 attacks, flying was restricted for several weeks. He said when students were allowed to fly once again, there were numerous restrictions.

"Nobody was happy about not being able to fly," he said. "But we understood how it had to be. It was just the waiting game."

Steichen said there aren't as many restrictions now, but that all the pilots always have to be careful of restrictions of flying over military bases, for example.

"Now it seems that we're just keeping an eye on what the major airlines do," he said. "Every rule is important, and we understand what they're for."

While most people think security measures fall upon the airlines, Johnston said, in reality, it is a national issue.

"The whole country has to maintain a certain level of awareness," he said. "It is not a compartmentalized problem that falls to one group only. Everyone needs to pay attention," he said.

ALERT | Nation moves to heightened state of alert following threats

measures taken immediately after last year's attacks. For example, Vice President Dick Cheney canceled a Tuesday night speech and was taken to a secret location to protect the presidential line of succession in case of an attack.

Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld ordered that live anti-aircraft missiles be stationed near launchers that had been deployed around Washington for a training exercise.

Across the country, access was restricted to public places and events. Colorado Gov. Bill Owens, announcing security measures at the state capitol, told residents, "You should probably bring your driver's license" to the building.

Local police were on edge. They urged residents to report any suspicious activity.

Among 15 or so U.S. diplomatic posts closed overseas, the embassy in Jakarta and a consular office in Surabaya, both in Indonesia, were shut down due to what officials called credible and specific information about security threats.

Despite no evidence of a plot against America, the Sept. 11 anniversary and threats of car bomb or other attacks against U.S. interests abroad made officials nervous enough to seek the higher threat status.

Bush approve raising the level from a "significant risk" of attacks — code yellow — to a high danger or code orange. It is the highest alert level imposed since the system was established in March.

A grim-faced Ashcroft said U.S. intelligence, based on information from a senior al-Qaeda operative in the last day or so, believes terrorists operating in several South Asian countries hope to explode car bombs or launch other attacks on U.S. facilities abroad.

The plans are believed to be linked directly to al-Qaeda, rather than one of its affiliates, said a government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The al-Qaeda operative who provided some of the information has been in the custody of an unidentified foreign country for several months, but he has not been publicly identified.

Ashcroft said the government also has learned of plans in the Middle East to launch one or more suicide attacks against U.S. interests. "At this time, we have no specific information as to where these attacks might occur," Ashcroft said.

The intelligence community believes the most likely targets at home and abroad are transportation and energy facilities or other symbols of U.S. power, such as military facilities, embassies and national monuments, he said.

"In addition, U.S. intelligence has concluded that lower-level al-Qaeda operatives may view the Sept. 11 anniversary as a suitable time to lash out in even small strikes to demonstrate their worldwide presence and resolve," Ashcroft said.

"Widely dispersed, unsophisticated strikes are possible," he warned.

U.S. officials found little solace in the fact that the threats focused on overseas targets; a similar pattern was detected just before the Sept. 11 attacks, they said.

"Americans need to go about their lives," Bush said. "They just need to know that their government, at the federal and state and local level, will be on an extra level of alert to protect us."

He planned to travel Wednesday under extraordinarily tight security to the sites of last year's attacks in suburban Washington, New York and Pennsylvania. The Secret Service bolstered security around the White House, paying special attention to vehicles riding on a nearby road recently closed to trucks.

The State Department issued a notice of "worldwide caution" to Americans abroad.

The General Services Administration, which operates and provides security for most federal buildings, implemented new security procedures.

The Environmental Protection Agency ordered water system operators to bolster security.

The Agriculture Department told meat inspectors to look for anything suspicious.

Military bases worldwide also were put on higher alert this week because of the anniversary, and the military resumed 24-hour fighter jet patrols over New York City and Washington.

On Capitol Hill, the House sergeant at arms installed steel cabinets in the press gallery to store "escape hoods" that allow people to breathe in case of a biological or chemical attack. Congress has bought 25,000 of the hoods.

DRIVE | Despite West Nile scares, Red Cross blood donations keep pace

ed via a blood transfusion or an organ transplant, she said. "If it was the transfusion, it's important to note that the West Nile virus is not necessarily fatal."

No confirmed cases of West Nile virus have been contracted via a blood transfusion or an organ transplant, she said.

Potential blood donors receive health screenings and are given a phone number to call if they begin to feel ill within a week or two of donating, Cox said. Standard procedures used by volunteers should identify potential donors with symptomatic West Nile virus, Cox said.

The American Red Cross and the CDC are working to develop a screening process to detect the presence of West Nile virus in collected blood.

However, risks of contracting the virus from blood trans-fusions are so minute, Cox said, that people shouldn't worry.

The drive is scheduled from 7 a.m. to 2 p.m. today and corresponds with the commemoration of Sept. 11 — a factor coordinators believe will contribute to increased donations.

"It is important to donate blood to keep an adequate supply," said Jason Lantz, assistant director of the Flint Hills chapter of the American Red Cross and senior in biology. "It's also an active way to commemorate Sept. 11 and remember those lives that were lost last year."

The amount of volunteers for the event has doubled, said Lantz, and the drive is open extended hours.

There were 150 donors at the July blood drive, said Randy Crow, director of communications for the mall, and he said he expects the turnout for this drive to be as good or better.

FIELD DAY | K-State teaches elementary students about agronomy

A weather station exhibit helped attendees learn about climate and weather in Kansas, Mary Knapp, state climatologist, said. It helped pupils understand the drought farmers have been experiencing and how lack of rainfall affects agriculture, she said.

In a dark, underground tunnel called a lysimeter, attendees could see crops growing beneath the soil surface, Shroyer said. The lysimeter contains technology that helps agronomists monitor root growth and moisture levels in the soil.

Pupils from Ken Garwick's sixth-grade class at Marlatt Elementary School said their favorite exhibits were the remote-sensing and wind tunnel exhibits.

"The wind tunnel showed you that if you don't work your ground right, it will blow dust," Shayla Dressman said.

Technology exhibits also were highlights.

"I liked the parachute with the camera so you could see around the field, then they showed us on the TV they had," Cindy Okot-Kotter said.

The remote-sensing demonstration used a camera attached to a kite to take pictures of pupils from the air. The technology is useful in making farming decisions, Jay Ham, professor of agronomy, said.

"There are things you can see from space that you can't see from the ground," Ham said. "You can see patterns that help us make decisions about the way farmers farm."

The field day provided a connection to topics being discussed in some science classes at the schools, Shroyer said.

Depo-Provera
Contraceptive Injection
medroxyprogesterone acetate injectable suspension

Birth control you think about just 4x a year.

DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection (medroxyprogesterone acetate injectable suspension, USP)

This product is intended to prevent pregnancy. It does not protect against HIV infection (AIDS) and other sexually transmitted diseases.

What is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection is a form of birth control that is given as an intramuscular injection (a shot) in the buttock or upper arm every 3 months (12 weeks). To ensure your contraceptive protection, you must return for your next injection promptly at the end of 3 months (12 weeks). DEPO-PROVERA contains medroxyprogesterone acetate, a chemical similar to (but not the same as) the natural hormone progesterone, which is produced by your ovaries during the second half of your menstrual cycle. DEPO-PROVERA acts by preventing your egg cells from maturing. If an egg is not released from the ovaries during your menstrual cycle, it cannot become fertilized by sperm and result in pregnancy. DEPO-PROVERA also causes changes in the lining of your uterus that make it less likely for pregnancy to occur.

How effective is DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
The efficacy of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection depends on following the recommended dosage schedule exactly. (See "How often do I get my shot of DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?" in this section.) In clinical studies, you are not pregnant when you first get DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection, your first injection must be given ONLY during the first 5 days of a normal menstrual period. ONLY within the first 5 days after childbirth must be used. If you do not follow this schedule, your protection against pregnancy is reduced. DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection is over 99% effective when used as directed. The effectiveness of DEPO-PROVERA depends only on the patient returning every 3 months (12 weeks) for her next injection. Your health-care provider will help you compare DEPO-PROVERA with other contraceptive methods and give you the information you need in order to decide which contraceptive method is the right choice for you.

The following table shows the percentage of women who get pregnant while using different kinds of contraceptive methods. It gives both the lowest expected rate of pregnancy (the rate expected in women who use each method exactly as it should be used) and the typical rate of pregnancy (which includes women who become pregnant because they forgot to use their birth control or because they did not follow the directions exactly).

Method	Lowest Expected	Typical
DEPO-PROVERA	0.1%	0.1%
Oral contraceptives (pills)	0.1%	0.2%
Injectable contraceptives (other than DEPO-PROVERA)	0.1%	0.2%
Vaginal ring	0.1%	0.2%
Vaginal sponge	0.1%	0.2%
Diaphragm (with spermicide)	0.1%	0.2%
Cervical cap	0.1%	0.2%
Vulva seal	0.1%	0.2%
Female condom	0.1%	0.2%
Withdrawal	0.1%	0.2%
Coitus interruptus	0.1%	0.2%
Abstinence	0.1%	0.2%

What are the risks of using DEPO-PROVERA Contraceptive Injection?
The side effect reported most frequently by women who use DEPO-PROVERA for contraception is a change in their normal menstrual cycle. During the first year of using DEPO-PROVERA, you might have one or more of the following changes: irregular or unpredictable bleeding or spotting, an increase or decrease in menstrual bleeding, or no bleeding at all. Unusually heavy or prolonged bleeding, however, is not a usual effect of DEPO-PROVERA, and if this happens, you should see your health-care provider right away. With continued use of DEPO-PROVERA, bleeding usually decreases, and many women stop having periods completely. In clinical studies, 55% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding throughout after 1 year of use, and 68% of the women studied reported no menstrual bleeding after 2 years of use. The reason that your periods stop is because DEPO-PROVERA causes a resting state in your ovaries. When your ovaries do not release an egg monthly, the regular monthly growth of the lining of your uterus does not occur and, therefore, the bleeding that comes with your normal menstruation does not take place. When you stop using DEPO-PROVERA, your menstrual period will usually return to its normal cycle.

Bush to ask for U.N. help

President insists sufficient evidence exists for Iraq strike

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush said Tuesday he will ask the United Nations "to deal with the problem" of Iraq and dispatched top members of his national security team to Capitol Hill to talk to skeptical lawmakers.

Bush tied his goal of toppling Iraqi President Saddam Hussein to the war on terror.

"I'm deeply concerned about a leader who has ignored the United Nations for all these years, refused to conform to resolution after resolution after resolution, who has weapons of mass destruction," Bush said during a visit to the Afghan Embassy.

"And the battlefield has now shifted to America; so there's a different dynamic than we've ever faced before."

The president does not plan to offer new information about an Iraqi threat or recommend any specific actions in his Thursday speech, a senior White House official said on condition of anonymity. Lawmakers said George Tenet, the director of central intelligence, and national security adviser Condoleezza Rice also gave no new information in congressional briefings Tuesday.

U.S. allies and members of Congress have urged Bush to give them more evidence that Saddam's nuclear, biological and chemical weapons programs pose a direct threat.

In his U.N. speech Thursday, the administration official said, Bush plans to respond with a challenge of his own: "What more do we need to know?"

Outside experts and U.S. officials say Iraq probably has stocks of chemical and biological weapons and could make a nuclear bomb if it could obtain enough nuclear material. Iraq denies having weapons of mass destruction.

"This is not something where you can wait until you have clear evidence," Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz said in a Tuesday interview with AP Broadcast.

"In fact, one of the fundamental points that Sept. 11 should have brought home to us is that you may not have a clear case after the fact, because the nature of terrorism is that it operates in the shadows, and it could be a way for a country that wants to do us harm to do it in a semi-anonymous way."

Some members of Congress said they still weren't convinced.

"I set the mark very high," House Majority Leader Dick Armey said. "I will need to see a plan before I will cast a vote. I will need to see it is necessary, and there is a plan that I personally think is the courage we ask of these young people."

next day.

"We just have to sit and think through the entire process and gain some more information," Coach Bill Snyder said during the Sept. 11 press conference.

And they did. Nearly all games across the country were put on hold for that week.

"The decision was, at that time, to move forward absent any information in contrary and knowing full well that we still had a lot of uncertainty about travel issues for those teams, both conference and non-conference, that would be traveling," Athletic Director Tim Weiser said Sept. 13.

At this time a year ago, K-State was preparing, then not preparing, for Louisiana Tech.

Today they prepare for Eastern Illinois with thoughts still in their heads of the Americans who lost their lives on Sept. 11.

"It happened far away, but it still affected all of us," linebacker Terry Pierce said. "Because we are all Americans, it still hits close to home."

are still fresh in his mind.

"My heart is still with all the people who suffered last year," Dunn said. "It puts things in perspective for you. When we come to 9/11 again you really want to remember what's important to this country and what we need to focus on. If we can do that I think we'll be just fine."

And maybe that's what we need right now -- the sense that things are going to be OK.

There are still so many questions about what we should be doing to fight back, about what our nation must do to ensure that what happened last September will never happen again.

Only time will tell if the decisions we make as a nation will be the right ones, but we have a responsibility to consider them. We should decide, and we should accomplish. And today, and in the time that comes after, we should never forget what happened.

In the meantime, it couldn't hurt to watch a ball game.

Students feel safe studying abroad

Sept. 11 attacks don't change attitudes of those learning in foreign lands

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Dan Lindahl wasn't worried about boarding a plane just weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks.

But his mother was. "My mom didn't want me to go," Lindahl, senior in business marketing, said. "But I wasn't worried. I felt safer."

Lindahl moved to Munich, Germany, just weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks to attend the University of Munich on a study abroad program. He said moving to a foreign country after the attacks was strange because it didn't affect the people of Munich the same way it did him.

"They watched the news all the time like we did here, but I don't think they were affected near to the extent we were," he said.

Crissan Zeigler, international programs adviser, said only three students decided not to go abroad last fall because of the Sept. 11 attacks. She said the attacks put things into perspective for students abroad, but it didn't really change the program.

"Essentially it just made us more conscious of safety," she said.

Zeigler said there was initial concern from students and parents who were either going abroad or were already abroad, but they were able to assure everyone that safety was the No. 1 issue.

"Right after the attacks we got immediate responses from all the study abroad sites stating that our students were fine," she said. "We got letters from all the students and they all had initially positive reac-

The Sept. 11 attacks spurred the international programs office to do several things. One was to make contact lists of all parents of study abroad students. Another was to send information to every U.S. embassy to make the different countries aware of the American students present there.

Lastly, Zeigler said they sent letters from the office to parents and students who were abroad, informing them of where they could follow U.S. news and developments. She said one of the things that concerned students most was that they didn't know what was going on in America.

"Many students were confused because they would watch the news and not understand," she said.

"They would just see a plane hitting the World Trade Center."

Zeigler said another concern of the international programs office right away was the treatment of Muslim students on campus.

"While there were no serious incidents, when we talked to Muslim students they said the most difficult thing was that no Americans reached out to befriend them," Zeigler said. "They felt bereft of American friendship."

She said it also was important to contact parents of international students at K-State.

"We wrote to all the parents of students here," she said. "Some of them thought that Manhattan, New York, was Manhattan, Kansas."

The international programs office and study abroad program hasn't been changed because of the attacks, Zeigler said, but it has made participants take on a new way of seeing the world.

"There is a huge difference in understanding tragedy from the international perspective," she said.

"Things like this happen all the time in other countries. Why is the United States so special? It really shows us how lucky we are that this would stop the United States from functioning."

Iraqi official calls for U.N. inspections

By Selcan Hacaoglu
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — In conflicting signals, a senior Iraqi official on Tuesday called on Arabs to rise and "confront" America, barely a day after another official said Iraq wanted to be a trade partner, not a battlefield foe, with the United States.

In the United Nations, meanwhile, chief arms inspector Hans Blix said there was no evidence from aerial photos or other sources that Iraq has weapons of mass destruction or is trying to build them. But he added there are still "many open questions" about Iraq's weapons programs that need to be answered.

He urged Iraq to allow U.N. inspectors back and reiterated that if Baghdad cooperated fully with inspections, he could recommend that the Security Council suspend sanctions within a year.

Washington officials accuse

President Saddam Hussein of harboring terrorists and possessing weapons of mass destruction. President Bush has not decided whether to attack Iraq, but he insists Saddam must be removed from power.

Regarding the standoff with the United States, Iraqi Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan said, "We categorically believe that the aggression on Iraq is an aggression on all the Arab nation."

Saudi Arabia, meanwhile, joined European nations in saying the United States should work through the United Nations to contain any possible Iraqi threat.

President Bush's administration, trying to build world support as it considers military action to oust Saddam, says debate among its allies has shifted from a question of whether the United States should confront Iraq to how.

Bush said Tuesday he will ask the U.N. "to deal with the problem."

Police recover stolen property

19-year-old remains in Riley County jail; bond set at $20,130

By Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Police estimate that as many as 50 stolen items were found at a Manhattan apartment late Tuesday evening.

The suspect, 19-year-old Clarence Everett Jones Jr., was arrested at 9:50 p.m. Tuesday after police traced a stolen vehicle to 925 Gardenway Apt. 4, where Jones had stayed with a Manhattan resident.

According to the Riley County Police Department, Jones is charged with seven counts of burglary, one count of attempted burglary, three counts of theft and three counts of forgery. Jones also is charged with a bench warrant for failure to appear. All charges were filed in Riley County.

"We've charged him with these counts, and we anticipate charging him with other burglaries, which are still under investigation," said Capt. Gary Grubbs of the RCPD.

Grubbs also said Jones is a suspect in a Pottawatomie County residential burglary.

Jones, originally from Virginia, is a soldier at Fort Riley, where he also is wanted for being absent without leave. Grubbs said Jones forged signatures in stolen checkbooks, and that all the crimes had occurred throughout the past few weeks. Most of the burglaries took place during daylight. To

Football player pleads guilty; charges reduced because of past

The case against K-State junior fullback Travis Wilson has been settled.

At his preliminary hearing Tuesday, Wilson pleaded guilty to one misdemeanor count of criminal damage to property and one misdemeanor count of obstruction of the legal process. He will go on diversion for the first count and be put on probation for 12 months for the second charge.

Wilson originally was charged with a felony count of criminal damage to property, but it was reduced to a misdemeanor.

Assistant Riley County Attorney Valerie Peterson said the state made the decision to lessen the charge based on investigations.

"We just decided it was a fair resolution provided the investigation that was done. He had no prior criminal history, we felt he was a good candidate for the misdemeanor criminal damage, and the obstruction we felt was an appropriate action for him given his actions that night," Peterson said.

Wilson was arrested June 28 for battery, battery of an officer, criminal damage to property, obstruction of the legal process and aggravated intimidation of a witness.

In June, Riley County Police Department Lt. Kurt Moldrup said Wilson had battered his Sept. 11, 2001 affected the way Americans feel, the way they look at life and the way they look at others. And that change was no different at K-State.

Students, staff and community members packed the K-State Student Union Plaza on Wednesday for a Sept. 11 observance: "Remembrance, Hope and Commitment."

"We are here today to remember," said Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State, as the ceremony began, "to remember and honor those who died and to give our love and support to one another, as well as the families that have been hurt."

That love and support stems from a changed community, he said.

"We have become a different type of community at K-State," he said. "There is a greater sense of spirituality, a greater sense of hope. We have learned to understand Islam more, and we understand it does not teach the violence we have seen

He remembers where he was exactly one year ago. He remembers the hurt, and he remembers the pain.

But on Wednesday, Firebaugh, senior in psychology and history, took time to remember and honor the heroes and victims of Sept. 11.

"I just did this to remember them," he said of the American flag protruding from his book bag.

Holly Schaper, sophomore in open-option, said she remembers.

She decided to tie a ribbon to one of three trees dedicated to Sept. 11 victims to show just that.

"I just thought it was a good idea to remember everyone that died on Sept. 11," Schaper said.

She, too, has re-run that day through her mind.

"I was in my dorm room, and my roommate came in and woke me up," she said.

"I just remember how sad it was and crying all day."

"It just seemed like the respectful thing to do, to show that they won't be forgotten. We will remember them and honor them."

Firebaugh was one of several hundred students who attended Wednesday's campus Sept. 11 observance ceremony.

"I wanted to be with other people, to see how other people are handling this," he said, "to see if other people remember."

Firebaugh said he, too, didn't know anyone that died that day. But its anniversary was still difficult, he said.

"It's America," he said. "It doesn't happen here. We're so used to being free."

He said he still deals with emotions that stem from the tragic day.

"The anger and hurt are still there," he said.

"It's diminished, but it's still there. Now it's sorrow for their loved ones."

The ceremony was a good way to remember those who lost their lives, Firebaugh said.

"It was a very well-done ceremony — not too drawn out — heartfelt, well-organized and respectful," he said.

"And I thought the trees were a nice touch."

SPOTLIGHT | Campus faith

Don Fallon, university coordinator of religious activities, gives the opening remarks at the memorial service in the K-State Student Union Plaza. The event attracted more than 2,000 people.

Religion organizer shares testimony with students, coordinates memorials

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Don Fallon was 14 years old when the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor.

The event motivated Fallon, coordinator of religious activities at K-State, to become a chaplain.

In 1952, Fallon graduated from Wartburg Seminary in Iowa and enrolled in active duty, as a chaplain for the United States Air Force.

"Upon leaving active duty, I started a Lutheran mission church in Topeka and was called to campus ministry at Kansas State University," Fallon said.

In 1965, Fallon came to K-State as a campus minister through the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and has stayed ever since.

"He's an incredible humanitarian and a tremendous individual of great passion and has provided remarkable service to students and families in crisis," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

At K-State, Fallon is the adviser of the Committee on Religion and an active member on the Communicable Disease Committee.

Fallon also is an active participant of the Sept. 11 remembrance, holocaust remembrance, and sponsor of the interfaith dialogue at the Community Cultural Harmony Week at the end of September. In addition, Fallon serves as a resource to residence halls and the student life staff.

Bosco said he thinks Fallon is remarkable.

"He's the first person we call in the middle of the night when one of our students are hurting — he's always been there," Bosco said. "He works day and night, seven days a week with students and families. We have many testimonials from families and students about his care and compassion, and his uncanny ability to always find the right words to say that are comforting and meaningful."

Fallon said he is in the ministry profession because he likes caring for people and enjoys K-State because of the caring people here.

"We have made very close friends in the university community, and it's been a privileged line of work to enter personal lives of so many people, both professionally and as friends," Fallon said.

"It's been a rich experience."

girlfriend and was standing over her when officers arrived. When officers announced themselves, Wilson approached one of them and shoved the officer.

He also threatened his girlfriend not to say anything to police, resulting in the aggravated intimidation of a witness charge.

Peterson said the state worked with the police department to find a good resolution.

RCPD Executive Director Mike Watson could not be reached for comment.

As part of Wilson's conditions of probation, he must complete 40 hours of community service to be performed within six months, obtain a mental health evaluation and follow all recommendations.

Wilson must also show written proof of attendance at counseling to a diversion officer and give a personal apology to RCPD officer Sam Hamilton — who was allegedly battered — in a scheduled meeting at the Riley County Law Enforcement Center.

If Wilson fails to meet the terms, he will be sentenced to 30 days in the Riley County Jail.

Wilson remains on the football team. However, he no longer is a captain.

KSU dedicates memorials

Trees presented in remembrance of attack victims

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After the Sept. 11 attacks, the Student Governing Association decided to memorialize those who had lost their lives by planting three Allee Chinese Elm trees in the K-State Student Union Plaza.

The trees, which were planted Sept. 19, 2001, were dedicated in a ceremony Wednesday. Students and organizations were invited to tie white ribbons on the trees commemorating the victims and heroes of Sept. 11.

The trees were planted as the result of an SGA resolution that urged the memorialization of the victims of the tragedy, said Dea Brokesh, one of the landscape architects who helped with the project.

In the Student Senate meeting following Sept. 11, 2001 former student body president Kyle Barker and faculty representative Bill Muir brought up the idea of a memorial, Muir said.

Donations were accepted during the meeting to pay for the trees, Muir said.

"I made the promise to all the senators that I would match whatever they put into the hat, which ended up being $400," Muir said.

State funding paid for the remainder of the cost, Brokesh said.

Along with the trees is a plaque that states "In memory of the the human lives that were lost on September 11, 2001 in New York City, Washington, D.C. and Pennsylvania, and to honor the courage, spirit and strength of the people of the United States of America."

Brokesh said she picked Chinese Elms, also known as Lace Elms, because of their popularity on the East Coast.

"The tree is commonly found in the areas where the attacks happened," Brokesh said. "Also, it's similar to the American Elm but a lot more resistant to Dutch Elm disease."

It was important to SGA that the trees were larger than the average transplanted tree, Muir said.

"These were big trees already when we got them. They were close to mature size after only being planted seven or eight months," he said. "Everyone who helped donate was really happy because the trees were big."

The trees also are getting a favorable response from students.

"I think the trees are a really nice addition to the courtyard area, as opposed to just concrete like it was last year," Ryan Cloyd, sophomore in psychology, said.

Cloyd said he did have one concern about the accompanying plaque.

"They could have made the plaque big enough to see when you're walking by, instead of looking like a utility outlet," he said.

Because there were no dedications for the trees when they were planted, Wednesday's ceremony gave everyone involved a chance to formally dedicate the trees.

"When the trees were planted last September we just stuck them in the ground," Muir said. "At this ceremony, we were able to get them officially recognized."

Mayor encourages community involvement to further freedom

Variety of civic leaders speak on strengthening resolve in face of tragic events

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The message was clear: remember, honor, educate and serve.

This, said city and group leaders, is how to pay tribute to Sept. 11.

"On this anniversary, let us pause and remember those who were lost and those who sacrificed to aid others and those who grieve," Mayor Ed Klimek said. "But also let us honor them all by furthering the cause of freedom and democracy in our lives."

Klimek urged residents Wednesday night at the Sept. 11 Tribute in City Park to honor those who protect the city. He then honored local heroes by recognizing the fire department, police department and EMS.

Klimek then read a city proclamation dedicating Sept. 11, 2002, as "Always Remember 9/11 Day."

"We salute the heroism of public safety and rescue workers, volunteers and local officials and those who responded to these tragic events with courage, selfless compassion, determination and skill. We dedicate Sept. 11, 2002, as 'Always Remember 9/11 Day' - a day to mourn, reflect and rededicate ourselves to ending terrorism in commemoration of the anniversary of the terrorist attacks."

To honor the victims, Klimek encouraged citizens to sustain their newfound patriotism through volunteerism, community involvement and service.

Renee Spurlock, who was sent twice to Ground Zero for the Red Cross Disaster Team, agreed.

She thanked the community for donating to the Red Cross and discussed her experience while in New York. She then urged the community to volunteer.

"We can't control what other people do," she said, "but we can control our response to it."

President of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce Lyle Butler applauded the city for its response after Sept. 11. He said that when the World Trade Center towers were destroyed, about 19,000 businesses were lost. But after a week, consumer spending returned in New York. And it returned in the Little Apple, too.

He quoted then-chairman of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce Steve Van Andel.

"The spirit of enterprise doesn't live in buildings," he said. "It lives in the hearts and minds of all Americans." Steve's words prove true.

He said Americans have demonstrated their commitment to free enterprise and democracy.

"In addition to paying homage to the thousands of innocent people who lost their lives one year ago today, one of the best things we can do as Americans is to strengthen our resolve, and that is to continue supporting the economy," Butler said. "These folks did not win."

The sacrifice of those who lost their lives Sept. 11 will never be forgotten, he said.

Mohammad Al-Deeb, representative of Manhattan's Islamic Center, agreed.

He said it is important to remember that those who committed the horrific acts do not represent all Muslims.

"I'm here to say that in Islam, there is no room - there is no place - for terrorism," Al-Deeb said.

He said it is important to make a distinction between the behavior of the terrorists and Islam.

He also urged the community to visit the local mosque and educate themselves about Islam.

"We all know that knowledge is power, so it is good to arm yourself with knowledge about other cultures, other religions," he said.

Following the speeches, there was a candlelight vigil. The Manhattan Municipal Band, which played patriotic songs throughout the evening, then performed "God Bless America."

During the performance, David McGillis, Manhattan resident, was one who extended his candle into the air.

McGillis sat with his son, daughter and mother-in-law, while his wife and oldest son performed in the band. Last year, McGillis said, he was unable to be with his family on Sept. 11 because he was in Kuwait for the army.

But this Sept. 11, also his son's birthday, was different.

"It was just more of a family-oriented day," he said. "It's just a be-with-your-family day."

Megan Ochoa, 5, and her mother, Amy, hold candles during the candlelight vigil Wednesday night at City Park. The Manhattan Municipal Band played, and local firemen, EMTs and police officers were recognized at the event.

Bush strategists consider deadline for renewed weapons inspections

President to offer reasons for war in Iraq

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATE PRESS

President Bush will use a U.N. speech Thursday to demand that Iraq admit weapons inspectors and to urge world leaders to insist on Saddam Hussein's compliance, U.S. officials said.

Bush intends to cite a list of at least a dozen instances in which the Iraqi president defied U.N. resolutions calling for inspections of suspected weapons sites and for disarmament.

At the same time, Bush hopes to gather support from reluctant allies and others for using force against Iraq. Bush's strategists, meanwhile, are considering setting a deadline with serious consequences if Saddam balks.

The implicit warning of U.S. military action to remove Saddam from power would come in a U.N. Security Council resolution by Britain. A veto by Russia, China or France

A senior U.S. official said Bush is going to make clear that the current regime in Iraq is an outlaw regime, that it has defied U.N. resolutions for 11 years now.

Bush's national security adviser has put the matter in stark terms, saying that with Iraq's buildup of destructive weapons "we don't want the smoking gun to be a mushroom cloud," he said.

Secretary of State Colin Powell did some preliminary diplomacy on Wednesday, discussing what he described as a need to enforce Security Council resolutions with the foreign ministers of the other four permanent council members - Britain, China, France and Russia - along with his German and Australian counterparts.

Bush contends he does not need new legal authority to use force to try to oust Saddam.

The White House cites U.N. resolutions dating from 1990-91 Persian Gulf war that reversed Iraq's annexation of Kuwait.

Britain is solidly in the U.S. camp, but German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder has dismissed military action as an "adventure" and other foreign leaders have expressed doubts. Bush has said he is prepared to act unilaterally if need be.

Israel's foreign minister, Shimon Peres, said Bush had told him he would do what he must.

British Defense Secretary Geoff Hoon, who met with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld on Wednesday, said diplomacy should and would come first.

"But when dealing with dictators, diplomacy must be backed up by the certain knowledge in the dictator's mind that behind the diplomacy lies the real threat of force being used," Hoon said in a speech at the Heritage Foundation in Washington.

"So our message to Saddam is plain: no more conditions, no more games, no more prevaricating, no more undermining the U.N.'s authority."

Efforts to win congressional support are having mixed results.

Moving alone against Iraq would be the worst option, said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del.

"I will be extremely disappointed if the president goes and enunciates a unilateral approach: 'The world be damned, here we go.' That is not in our interest," Biden told the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia.

Some Democrats questioned the White House's urgency to oust Saddam.

"I don't like to say this is a political issue, that he's trying to distract the public from what's going on (domestically), because it's so serious that I hope it isn't," said Rep. John P. Murtha, D-Pa., the ranking member of the House Appropriations subcommittee on defense.

TO THE POINT RCPD should focus on being safe, not sneaky

The Riley County Police Department's use of unmarked patrol cars isn't a positive change.

RCPD Executive Director Mike Watson said the use of the unmarked cars will cut down on speeding and traffic accidents in high problem areas.

We think the use of them will only cause more problems.

Watson said the use of the unmarked cars will give police officers an element of surprise in tracking speed.

It seems like the element of sneakiness also fits into this equation.

Police officers are here to protect and serve the public. If cracking down on high speeding areas and traffic problem areas is a main concern, officers should simply patrol those areas more frequently and carefully.

The use of unmarked cars will only cause the public to be wary of the officers who pull them over. Of course, if a person is breaking the law, they should be reprimanded and punished, but being caught in a sneaky manner can only cause resentment and anger.

The RCPD should be concerned with every aspect of safety, but using unmarked patrol cars isn't the way to go about it. By using the cars, it only seems the RCPD is trying to be sneakier, not safer.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

WEST NILE FEVER

Common sense is best repellent against obscure, infectious disease

With autumn comes the seasonal crisp air, the changing of leaves and thunderous cheers from KSU Stadium.

And, of course, the manic trend of disease hysteria. Last year America battled an inanimate contaminant that lurked between the folds of an envelope.

This year, our foe hovers above, around and sometimes upon us.

Although anthrax and the West Nile virus are completely different threats — one obvious difference being malicious intent versus the random chance of fatality — these afflictions share a common bond: their celebrity.

News of senators scrambling from their offices a year ago is now replaced with ominous information regarding infected cattle and suspicious blood transfusions.

Though forlorn faces relay caustic facts of malicious insects out for more than our blood, there are a few facts that should be clarified to quell the fears of the misinformed and misled.

First, the media have pounced upon this story as if this virus is breaking news.

For Americans, yes, this is a relatively recent threat. For the eastern hemisphere, this disease is old news — more than 60 years old, in fact.

The first documented case of a human infected with the West Nile virus was in 1937.

According to the Center for Integration of Natural Disaster Information, this disease was primarily concentrated in Africa, West Asia and the Middle East.

Human infection was not documented in the western hemisphere until 1999.

Although this virus is widespread, the chance of fatality is extremely low.

It is estimated that less than 1 percent of humans who come in contact with the virus will develop any serious afflictions, states cindi.usgs.gov.

One out of 1,000 victims of West Nile will suffer from diseases such as meningitis, a swelling of the spinal chord or encephalitis, an inflammation of the brain.

Neither of these ailments sound too appealing, but take comfort in the odds. Unless you're as lucky as I am at gambling, you're most likely to elude these painful side effects.

In fact, the majority of humans exposed to the virus have no recognizable symptoms.

To further reassure those hypochondriacs on campus, the Centers for Disease Control has reported no cases of any Kansans testing positive for the West Nile virus to date.

Mosquitoes are considered the primary carrier of the virus, and the only real threat of infection for humans.

Though mosquitoes attain the virus from diseased birds, there have been no cases of bird-to-human transmission so far.

Though common sense might seem an antiquated arsenal against such a malady, it's the best preventive measure for this incurable disease.

First and foremost, avoid lounging outside at the mosquito's peak feeding hours: dusk and dawn.

Second, wear long sleeves and pants. Yes, I realize you'd be uncomfortable, but would an inflamed brain feel any better?

And, of course, a little citronella and bug spray goes a long way.

You'll be a sweaty recluse that emanates repellent, but if you're that one-in-a-thousand type of person, you'll be West Nile-free.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

A year ago, 3,000 people died horribly, and Paul White makes it into a sick joke. Nice job, Collegian.

Thank you to whoever stole our couch and lounge chairs off our front porch. I'm sure our neighbors don't miss their grill, either. Can't you drunks find something else to do on your way home from Aggieville?

Girls who don't wear clothes are definitely compensating for something they don't have, like a personality.

I don't know which is funnier: the fact that those three guys were catcalling in front of Dickens or the fact they were trying to pretend they were straight.

I would like to congratulate the Collegian for including the bilingual column. I am so happy that diversity is becoming more visible on our campus.

Of course they have to keep watering the sidewalks. They have to do something with our tuition increase. They can only pay the football players so much.

Don't drink and sleep. Accidents cause people.

Guys who wear flip-flops are hot.

Johnson County is your beacon of light, huh? You must live in a dark, dark world.

To the ladies who built the memorial on the tree stump outside Bluemont: That really was one of the most beautiful things I saw all day. Thank you.

Micah Hawkinson, if I can't complain about the way the school is running things, then I better not hear you complain about a bunch of song lyrics.

Band's refreshing sound renews faith in local music scene

The Schwag lit me up. You should let it light you up, too.

The Grateful Dead tribute band put on one of the most intense shows I've ever experienced Saturday at the Warehouse Opera House on Poyntz Avenue.

If you missed it, too bad for you. But don't fret, there will soon be other opportunities.

This particular show was not like a metal show where there are fights and drunken debauchery.

And it was nothing like hanging out with massaggonistic, thug wannabees at Rusty's Last Chance.

It was an entirely new experience all together.

The bands I listen to don't really make too much music anymore. I'm a huge Alice in Chains fan. I'll always love Blind Melon, Nirvana, Toadies, Mad Season, Black Crowes, Beatles, Cream, Jimi Hendrix and White Zombie.

And people will always make fun of me for enjoying "80s hair bands" like Crue, Warrent and Skid Row.

Of course, none of these groups ever made it to Manhattan, Kan., to play a show. The only big names I've heard here are Jackyl — who play guitar riffs with chainsaws — Tone Loc and Vanilla Ice.

Yeah, Vanilla Ice.

Nonetheless, I must say thank you to The Schwag for filling the recent void of intense live music and re-instilling my faith.

From 1965 to 1995, the Grateful Dead flourished as one of the most unusual and accomplished musical groups shaking up this country. The Dead has been an ongoing touring workhorse constantly exploring new realms. Its followers took a journey through an ever-shifting array of musical, cultural and mental horizons.

The Schwag keeps this ideal alive.

Its Web site, www.theschwag.com, states, "The Schwag delivers high-intensity jams, sound and fun, which sends listeners into frenzied dancing and eargasmic ecstasy."

This is most certainly true.

The band was really electrifying and intense. I was in awe, and I wasn't the only one diggin' it, either. Everyone I spoke with at the show had the most sincere acclamation for the music.

The most exciting thing about the concert was to see the exchange that occurred between the audience and the band. The more intense the band grew, the more the audience screamed for more.

It seems obvious, but it isn't easy.

The band has the musical talent and skill of seasoned professionals and the energy and enthusiasm of a Labrador puppy. The members make it look easy.

The band began 10 years ago in St. Louis, and the members appear to have so much fun doing what they obviously love.

The Schwag has opened shows for Little Feat, Leftover Salmon, JGB, String Cheese Incident, Merl Saunders and the David Grisman Quintet, and it plays more than 200 shows a year.

The next show in Kansas will be at Abe and Jake's Oct. 4 in Lawrence. I strongly suggest you attend.

Schwag shows are the perfect place to find that special chill spot. They add the necessary balance to so many genres of music.

If you're wound as tight as Micah Hawkinson, you're going to need a little Schwag to get you loosened up.

If you don't believe it is a good time, prove me wrong. Go to just one show and bring an open mind.

You won't even be able to pretend you're not having fun.

RCPD cracks down quietly

Police department implements program using unmarked cars

By Nick Bratkovic
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Riley County Police Department is using unmarked cars to patrol traffic and crack down on speeding in Manhattan.

"We are using some slick top vehicles, which have red lights and sirens, and are different colors, but they just don't have the lights on top," RCPD Executive Director Mike Watson said.

The department began using the cars last week and will utilize them in areas where people complain of speeding and at sites of numerous traffic accidents.

The use of the unmarked cars will continue in the future, Watson said.

The unmarked cars will give police officers an element of surprise in tracking speeding. In the past, Watson said, the department would receive complaints about certain areas and dispatch a traffic officer to patrol the area. The speeding would decrease when the officer was on patrol, but it increased when the patrolling stopped.

"We have always ran radar," Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the RCPD said. "We ran the radar gun, and when the unit is gone, they sped up again."

With the unmarked cars, Watson said he hopes speeds will remain lower.

"That is the only reason that we write tickets," Watson said. "That money goes to the state of Kansas or the city of Manhattan, and not the RCPD. That, and to cut down on accidents."

Watson said police officers often are dispatched to areas where residents complain of speeding, school zones and around bus stops in Manhattan. He said K-State Police jointly patrols areas surrounding the campus with RCPD.

Locations where the most speeding tickets occur and preliminary reports of the program were unavailable.

The program started just two weeks into K-State's academic year.

However, Moldrup said there isn't necessarily a connection between the usage of unmarked cars and classes starting. Still, he said an increase in population can increase the amount of traffic problems.

"It is more the volume. When you have 20,000 more people, you have a higher chance of accidents when you have a higher influx of people in town," Moldrup said.

Commission passes proposal on 4-1 vote for drive-thru liquor store in Aggieville

Alcohol retail becomes mobile

By Jennifer Farr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A proposal passed by City Commission on Tuesday could make ordering liquor similar to ordering fast food.

Passed on a 4-1 vote, the proposal will transform the former Mini's Diner, on the corner of 11th and Moro streets, into 11th Street Liquors.

Mark Bylka, local businessman, said he is establishing 11th Street Liquors because he believes it is a convenient way to distribute and receive liquor.

This proposal, Alcohol Beverage Control officials said, is not uncommon to Kansas. The idea of having a liquor store with a drive-thru window was established around the early 1990s.

"There is nothing in the Liquor Control Act that prohibits them," said Lisa Kaspar, spokeswoman for the State Revenue Office, which ABC is a part of.

Commissioners were concerned the turnoff from Moro Street onto 11th Street, where the drive-thru would be located, would cause traffic disruption. However, Chuck Jackson, chairman of the zoning board, said he didn't see any problems with the proposal since Moro Street was changed into a one-way.

"The traffic flow on 11th Street is down 50 percent since it was changed into a one-way street, and I believe that this type of business will not cause too much disruption to traffic," Jackson said.

"After all, we are talking about a liquor store, not a fast-food restaurant."

Another concern was people did not know where to enter or leave the drive-thru, but additions were made in the proposal for signs to be put up for entering and exiting the business.

Bylka said although the proposal has its risks, which were pointed out by residents, he is prepared to meet them.

"If someone pulls up, and they've obviously been drinking something, we are not going to sell to them," he said. "I would never do anything to make the drinking and driving situation worse, but the people who are going to drink and drive are going to drink and drive whether they buy it from me or someone else."

"Some people will think that having a liquor store with a pick-up window is wrong, mostly because they think it promotes drinking and driving."

Shauna Laauwe

Bylka said it will be more difficult to tell whether someone is underage. However, he plans on asking for identification from everyone. His main concern, he said, is trying to detect whether someone has had too much alcohol before driving up to the drive-thru window.

"If they come into the store, they are easier to identify," he said. "That's why if we notice that their speech is somewhat slurred, we won't sell to them. Under no circumstances will we sell to minors. Everyone who drives through is going to get carded unless they look like they're 55 years old."

Shauna Laauwe, city planner, said the board of zoning reviewed the rezoning application under the conditional use criteria.

The criteria used to consider the proposal is called conditional use because it is a drive-thru business.

Under the conditional use, the board has to look at the effect of the proposal on adjacent properties. Laauwe said she has not heard an objection from neighboring businesses concerning the proposal.

"Some people will think that having a liquor store with a pick-up window is wrong," Bylka said, "mostly because they think it promotes drinking and driving. However, that's not my plan."

"The board saw that I was proposing to open a store that will provide convenience to responsible drinkers while using the regulations and obeying the law. I am willing to work with whatever accommodations they need me to in order to open my business as easily and swiftly as possible. As long as I do that, I'm not hurting anyone, am I?"

USC game will be Cats' 1st true test

Tune-up contests have team prepared

The Collegian makes for great experience, and to say the least, I have learned a lot. But the Collegian is run like a professional paper, which at times can annoyingly restrict me from fully expressing my viewpoint.

Well, in my column, I can say what I want.

I am excited and I can't wait for the Southern Cal Trojans to chariot into KSU Stadium in 10 days.

So far, the Cats have tuned up quite nicely. The quarterback controversy seems to be at an end, and talented, exciting, players have risen to fill holes vacated due to graduation.

While last year the Cats did feature an excellent running back, that group lacked the excitement that Darren Sproles, Danny Morris and Ayo Saba bring to the table.

Sophomore Darren Sproles is the root of it all. Averaging 7 yards per carry, the guy has more moves than Jenna Jameson. I couldn't catch him if we were locked in a phone booth.

Sproles is so shifty, I'm confident no one can tackle him.

The only reason he doesn't take it all the way every time is he is saving something for the conference games coming up. Occasionally, he has to pretend to trip on a chalk line or allow a defender to "catch up" to him just so as not to attract too much attention yet.

At quarterback, I think Coach Bill Snyder has finally found an answer, but success at the position this year can't all be credited to Marc Dunn.

The Wildcat receivers are also improved from a year ago. Anyone who saw James Terry do a front flip that would make gymnast Shannon Miller envious and manage to land in the end zone would agree.

On defense, the Cats are just as intimidating as they were a year ago, and possibly even more so. They don't call themselves the Lynch Mob for no reason. Snyder has found every single guy who I would hate to meet outside a bar in Aggieville, given them pads and taught them to dominate.

Linebacker Terry Pierce commands the middle like a general in battle. After meeting the fearsome general, it's a battle I want nothing to do with and one I would rather watch behind some nice, thick plexiglass.

Pierce defines the term intimidation. He sports massive, bulging muscles strapped onto a big, tall frame.

I don't think the guy can flex while wearing a shirt without running serious risk of ripping it to shreds.

Sounds like an expensive problem. Getting an interview from him is a nightmare.

I am constantly afraid that he will get mad, grab my little tape recorder, bite it in half, and wrap me around a goal post or lift me overhead one handed and toss me off the press box — all tasks that would likely not even bring a drop of sweat to his brow.

Ladies and gentlemen, the Wildcat football team is bustling with stars. Saturday's game was like a highlight reel interrupted by kickoffs. They're a tremendous product, so please, stand, scream and be heard.

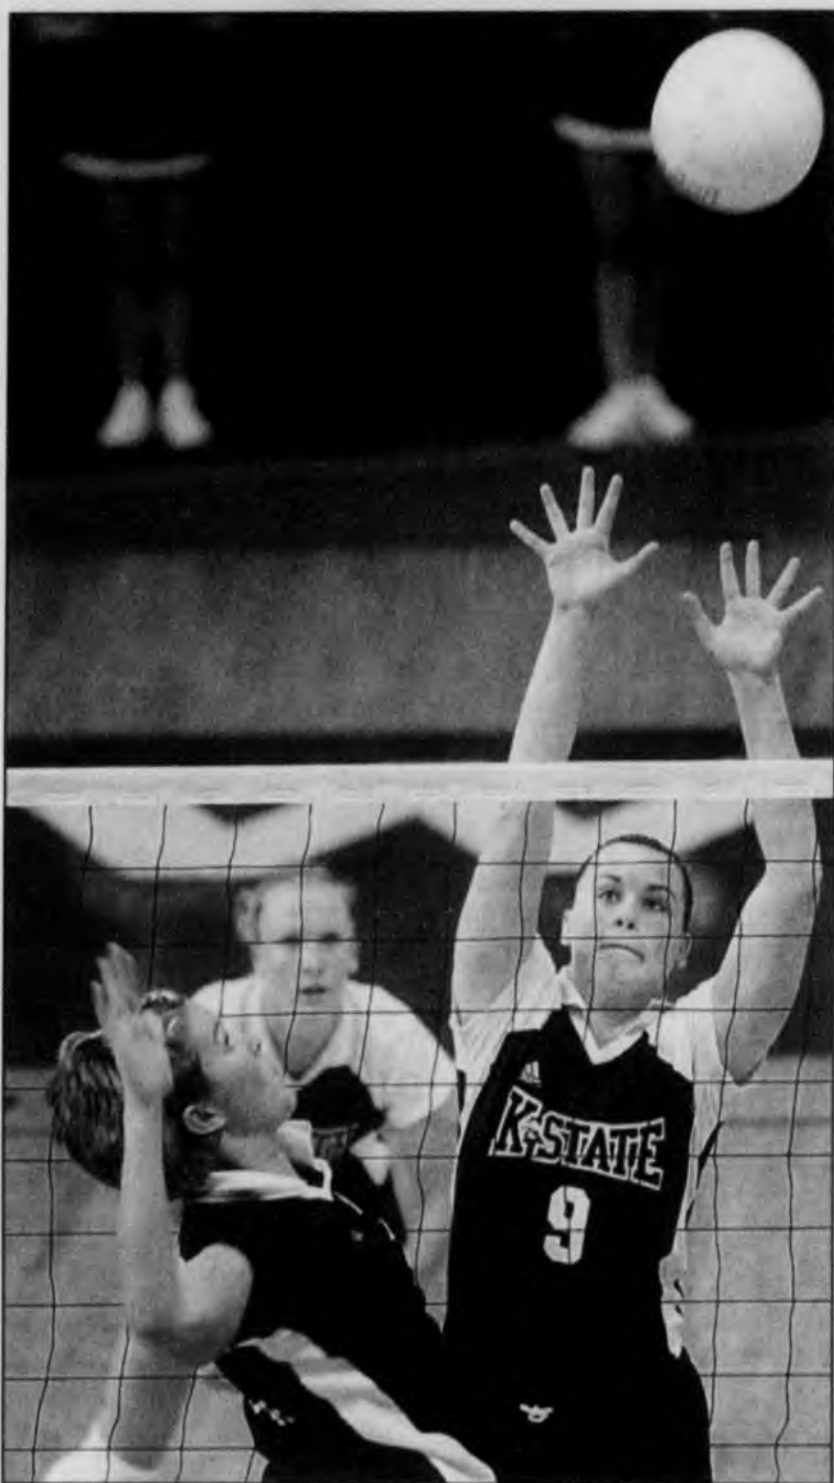

Maybe, if you yell loudly enough Terry Pierce, will just break that pretty little California surfer boy quarterback over his knee, Big 12 style, when the Cats come out of their alley to entertain USC on Sept. 21.

SOPHOMORE STABILIZER

K-State's Gabby Guerre prepares to block a shot by Arkansas State's Caitlyn Mitchell at last week's game. The women will be in action again in South Florida at the USF Invitational.

Setter's presence, talent important pieces of volleyball puzzle

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As a freshman, Gabby Guerre was the Cats' primary setter.

One year later, she's not only a regular starter but a leader on K-State's volleyball team, Coach Suzie Fritz said.

Just a sophomore, and quite possibly the biggest piece of the Cats' puzzle, Guerre said she only wants to be as good as her word.

And Fritz said that word is stability.

"Gabby just has a very calming demeanor about her," Fritz said. "She doesn't have real high highs and just doesn't have real low lows."

"I like that about her. She provides some needed stability for this team."

While K-State has been trying to fill holes on the offensive side this season, Guerre has remained consistently good, Fritz said, giving the hitters a perfect ball to score on.

Guerre averages just under 11 assists per game, all while committing very few errors each match.

"She isn't incredibly vocal, but she is very task-oriented," Fritz said.

"She understands her assignments, and she can run a gameplan perfectly because she's detailed."

And she works hard. Senior Jennifer Pollard said she is the blue-collar worker on the team, and it shows.

"She sweats like none other," she said. "Before the match even starts, her shirt is drenched."

Fritz said the same happens in practice. With just one main setter, Guerre is involved in every drill and scrimmage.

"She's a sweater," Fritz said. "She goes through two or three shirts a practice."

That's just a testament to her willingness to

A look at Guerre

Sophomore Gabby Guerre has been very consistent so far this season. Here's how her stats look after five matches.

■ 10.94 assists per game (Leads team)

■ .419 hitting percentage (2nd on team)

■ 2.12 digs per game (3rd on team)

Club soccer team enjoys new Memorial Stadium turf; squad sets goal of making appearance at nationals

By Brent Gray
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the past two Saturdays, students have flooded to KSU Stadium to watch the Cats overmatch an underqualified team.

During the games, the largest noticeable change at KSU Stadium is the new field.

But the patch of turf Marc Dunn passes on isn't the only new green field at K-State.

Though lesser known than Dunn, Steve Taylor, club soccer team president, passes on his new patch of turf and loves every minute of it.

"This is the closest thing to a pro stadium we'll get to play in."

Jim Compton,
SENIOR IN SECONDARY EDUCATION

"Everyone has been really excited about getting out here and playing on the new field," Taylor said. "Our big turnout for a team has been helped by the new field."

The recently completed turf at Memorial Stadium, built in 1924 and named after K-State students who died in World War I, has been welcomed by many club sports teams.

Now with the new turf, the soccer team hopes to be host to more games and maybe a tournament, Taylor said.

"Now that we have a nice field, I hope to be able to draw some very competitive teams that want to play on a new surface," he said.

Another draw for the new surface is that the soccer club will play its home games on campus.

Taylor said he hopes students who want something to do on the weekend will walk to Memorial Stadium and watch the team take on competitors from Kansas, Missouri and Arkansas, Chris Borjas, freshman in physics, dives after a soccer ball during practice Monday night at Memorial Stadium. Soccer is one of many intramural sports offered at K-State.

Taylor said.

For some, the field is a dream come true.

"This is the closest thing to a pro stadium we'll get to play in," Jim Compton, senior in secondary education, said. "Compared to Arrowhead or some other professional stadiums this field is pretty close."

Although the team dropped its first two games, 4-0 to Kansas, and 4-2 to Wichita State last weekend, Taylor said the first weekend of play is not what fans should expect out of them.

"We only practiced a week before we played," he said. "When we get some more time to put things together, we hope to give the campus something to cheer for."

The team has high expectations and knows that its talent level and commitment will only produce great things, Taylor said.

In the first rankings put out by the National Intramural-Recreational Sports Association for the Cats' region, Region 4, K-State was ranked 10th, behind both schools it lost to in the opening weekend. The Jayhawks were ranked third and the Shockers fifth.

"We know the first weekend doesn't show how good we are," Taylor said. "We have a lot of talent on the field."

The ultimate goal for the team is to get a chance at the National Tournament in Bakersfield, Calif., Nov. 20 to 23.

The Cats last competed for the national title five years ago and said they hope to return this season.

1-MINUTE DRILL

The Associated Press

NFL | Legend Unitas dead at 69

Johnny Unitas, the Hall of Fame quarterback who broke nearly every NFL passing record and won three championships with the Baltimore Colts in an 18-year career, died Wednesday. He was 69.

Unitas died of a heart attack, Baltimore Ravens spokesman Chad Steele said. Steele had no other details.

Unitas underwent emergency triple-bypass surgery in March 1993 after a heart attack.

He was the first to throw for 40,000 yards in his career and now ranks seventh, surpassed by a group of quarterbacks who played in an era when the rules made passing easier. Unitas retired after the 1973 season holding 22 NFL records, among them marks for most passes attempted and completed, most yards gained passing, most touchdown passes and most seasons leading the league in TD passes.

NBA | Shaq and the big toe saga

After almost three months of indecision, Shaquille O'Neal finally had surgery on his chronically sore big toe Wednesday and could miss the beginning of the season.

Recovery and rehabilitation time for the Los Angeles Lakers' center is expected to be six-to-eight weeks, said Dr. Robert Mohr, who removed bone spurs from a joint on the arthritic right big toe at at UCLA's Outpatient Surgery Center.

That means O'Neal could miss the three-time defending NBA champion Lakers' regular-season opener against San Antonio on Oct. 29. If he had surgery earlier, he probably would have been at full speed by the time the season began.

O'Neal has said he delayed the operation until he had checked out all the options and spoken with a number of doctors.

NBA | Weber pleads innocent

Chris Webber, the $123 million star of the Sacramento Kings, pleaded innocent Wednesday to charges of lying to a grand jury and obstructing justice.

Webber is accused of interfering with the grand jury's investigation of former University of Michigan booster Ed Martin.

Martin, a retired autoworker, says he lent Webber $280,000 while the basketball standout was in high school and at Michigan.

The 29-year-old Webber was a member of the "Fab Five" in the early 1990s, when the Wolverines went to two NCAA title games. He is starting the second year of a seven-year, $123 million contract with the Kings.

Big 12 | QB controversy in Waco

Aaron Karas may finally stop Baylor's quarterback merry-go-round.

Karas, who started last season's finale before dropping to No. 3 on the depth chart after new offensive coordinator Dave Baldwin was hired, has played himself back into the starting role following senior Greg Cicero's first-game breakdown.

"In the spring, Aaron was slowed down with the new offense and all of the reads we give quarterbacks and progressed at a different rate," Baldwin said. "In the preseason, Aaron took off, but Greg didn't let go."

Not until Cicero, starting his third straight season opener, threw three interceptions — two of them returned for touchdowns — in the first quarter at California. Baylor trailed 35-0 before Karas threw an 85-yard touchdown pass to Reggie Newhouse on the last play of the first quarter.

Boxing | Tyson back in the ring

Mike Tyson likely will make his return to the ring in December, with a fight against Clifford Etienne.

Tyson's manager, Shelly Finkel, said Wednesday he hoped to have a deal worked out next week for a Dec. 7 fight.

One possible roadblock to the fight, which would be televised on the Showtime cable network, is that HBO also is looking at Dec. 7 for a possible fight between WBA heavyweight champion John Ruiz and undisputed light heavyweight champion Roy Jones.

BY THE NUMBERS

Athletic department officials announced Tuesday that K-State's football game with Nebraska set for Nov. 16 has sold out.

A limited number of tickets are available for the remaining games on the Wildcats' 2002 football schedule.

About 1,500 tickets remain for the Texas game on Oct. 19, with all those available seats being in the north end zone. Approximately 2,500 tickets are available for the USC game, including seats in the north end zone and about 1,000 in visiting-team sections that were returned by USC.

Scissors, glue and old magazines aren't just for kindergarten projects.

Gluing pieces of paper to a painted or unpainted surface is, believe it or not, a respected and valid art form. But the craft of collage doesn't end there. Collage often incorporates another medium along with the paper, said Lynda Andrus, curator of "The International Collage Exhibit," a display on show in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union.

"Like all art, collage is used as a way of expression, and artists use all sorts of mediums in collage," she said. "Some people combine painting, drawing, clay and metals in their collage to show how they feel about something."

"Most of the time the items used are found and someone had previously used them. Most artists use writing somehow, so there is text and communication on several levels."

Collage started in 1912 when Picasso pasted a piece of commercially printed paper to his cubist painting Chair Caning, according to www.collage-town.com.

The exhibit features work from 27 well-known collage artists from 6 countries, and will be on display until Sept. 20.

Sharing the wealth

"The International Collage Exhibit" will be on display in the William T. Kemper Art Gallery in the K-State Student Union until Sept. 20.

Andrus, associate professor of art and head of the 3-D design department, is also one of the artists with work in the exhibit.

"I originally started off in ceramics but then got into collage," Andrus said. "That seems to be sort of a jump, but about every famous modern artist has worked in collage one time or another."

Andrus said her 3-D design classes will be studying the pieces used and will then communicate with the artists one on one.

"They will look at the pieces and then actually call up or e-mail the artist and catch insight to decisions and techniques used," she said. "It is a special experience and I'm excited to be able to provide that."

One of the best known collage artists on display, Jonathan Talbot, will come to Manhattan on Oct. 25 to offer tips, explain his technique and conduct a workshop at the Beach Museum.

"Collage is special, and about anything goes when someone creates a piece," Andrus said. "I hope that people stop and actually look at the pieces and notice the tactile quality and the different textures that each piece offers."

COMING UP

Back Porch Mary, an Austin, Texas-based band that got started in Manhattan, will come back tonight for a CD release party for its self-titled debut.

Guitarist and lead vocalist Mike Krug, 1997 K-State graduate, described the band's sound as hillbilly rock influenced by Social Distortion, Johnny Cash and Steve Earle. Though three of the band members are from Manhattan, Krug said he is the only remaining original member.

Here is what he had to say about the band's Manhattan performance

Q: Why did you move to Austin?

A: Austin was where we needed to be. Musicians head up here because the city has a really good music scene, and it's in a central location. There are four major cities for American music - L.A., New York, Nashville and here. Austin was the closest place to home where we could play full time.

Q: Why are you excited about the album?

A: We spent a lot of time on it. The producer, Stuart Sullivan has worked with Sublime, Junior Brown and the Supersuckers. It sounds just like the band does right now. That doesn't sound like much, but sometimes albums just don't sound like band. All the songs are good, and I feel like we made a great record.

I'm looking forward to getting to Manhattan, to seeing all the people who have supported us and to showing off the new record. We went through a lot of stuff to get to this final product, and we've been really fortunate. It would be wrong of me not to come home and play behind this record.

Q: Any other interesting developments?

Actually the band just finished being filmed in a movie called "Screendoor Jesus" from the producer of "Changing Lanes" and "Donnie Brasco."

The whole thing was a trip because the guy found us at a show and thought we'd be perfect for the band in the movie. We read the script, did the film, so four of our songs are in the movie now. We've never done anything like that before. It was pretty crazy.

LISTENING BOOTH

The Collegian wants to know what music you are listening to. If you are passionate about music and want to express your opinion, e-mail A&E Editor JJ Duncan at jjduncan\_80@hotmail.com, or call the newsroom, 532-6556.

This week we asked Ryan Hurley, guitarist and vocalist for Scholar what he's listening to.

What five albums are you listening to and why?

1. Our Lady Peace: "Gravity"

They pretty much epitomize my favorite sound of rock 'n' roll. It's got such a build.

2. Weezer: "Maladroit"

Those guys are tremendous. Rivers is the biggest musical genius out there. The only band they ever sound like is themselves.

3. Radiohead: "The Bends"

Potentially one of the best albums ever made. I think Thom Yorke is incredible on that album.

4. The Red Hot Chili Peppers: "By The Way"

Those guys keep making good music, and this is one of their best. There are so many songs that are untraditional of their style.

5. The Beatles: "Abbey Road"

The whole medley at the end, all the songs that run together, all of them — fantastic. I think it might be the best album ever. It doesn't show in the polls. I guess people like "Revolver," I don't get it.

Freedom Fest to entertain fans with multiple stages, local bands

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the hopes of creating an alternative to the Country Stampede with a festival that will become Manhattan's answer to Woodstock, Freedom Fest will make its debut this weekend.

Putting on this large rock festival has been an ongoing project for Ron Ford and Rich Webster, co-owners of R&R Productions.

"Freedom Fest is the first totally outdoor festival of its kind in this area," Ford said. "It's a tribute to our fallen people. It's a great way that we can gather as a collective group and have a good time."

"One main right that we all seem to overlook is the freedom of expression. We wanted to put together a venue that will feature the many local acts we have around here and give them a chance to express themselves."

Freedom Fest is an all-day event at Milford Lake's Thunderbird Marina. Gates will open at 11 a.m. Saturday, and 10 local and regional bands will bring their music to the audience.

Food, beverages and T-shirts will be for sale, and the night will end with a fireworks display provided by Fantom Fireworks. Tickets, $15 apiece, or 5 for $50, can be purchased at the gate, the Union Bookstore or at Ticketmaster outlets. Parking is free.

Milford Lake, the largest man-made lake in Kansas, offers more shoreline than any other lake in Kansas, and is a great place for a concert, Ford said.

"You won't be baking in the sun the whole time. There's plenty of shade that you can relax in," Ford said. "There's a good place to take a dunk in the cool, clean water, and all the time you can listen to some good music."

will be on the water's edge, and the fireworks will begin at dark.

Local musicians are ready for the festival because it will bring another venue to local music, which mainly has been limited to Aggieville, Bill Hurrelbrink, Tripwire bassist, said.

"I think it's a cool idea and a great way to showcase local music," he said.

Ben Schardein, guitarist and vocalist for the Blakes, said his band also is looking forward to playing Saturday.

"It seems like a site like this is middle ground for a lot of these smaller towns," he said. "I think a lot of this area really appreciates music and not only that, but local music. This is a central area for Salina, Manhattan, Junction City and other towns. I like to think that this is a melting pot of genres and styles from different communities."

The event came with its own complications for the two organizers. Seven months of planning and negotiations went into the large concert since people were wary of a large concert at first, Ford said. The promotional duo also put together the recent concert at the Wareham, featuring the Schwag and Sun Cured Red, and Ford said the event showed that music fans can be responsible and respectful.

"We spent hours of talking to law enforcement officers, the Army Corps of Engineers, and other agencies," Ford said. "But now everyone is excited about Freedom Fest."

With the music community geared up to go along with the several other agencies, the audience is the only thing left to make a successful music festival.

"I hope this shows that with a little determination and a lot of effort, you can pull off a huge concert like this," Schardein said.

Event Information

Freedom Fest, a music festival featuring 11 bands will be from noon to 9:30 p.m. Saturday. Tickets are $15 each, or $50 for a package of five, and are available at all Ticketmaster outlets, or by calling (785) 234-4345.

Legislators force Arafat's cabinet to resign in statement of anger toward regime

By Jamie Tarabay
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Defiant Palestinian legislators forced the resignation of Yasser Arafat's 21-member Cabinet Wednesday, delivering the biggest political blow to the Palestinian leader since he returned from exile eight years ago and underscoring the mounting discontent among ordinary Palestinians.

Arafat now has two weeks to present a new Cabinet to parliament.

Earlier in the day, Arafat set Jan. 20 as a date for presidential and parliamentary elections, making the announcement as part of a failed deal to save his Cabinet.

The setting of the specific date is likely to displease the United States, which had sought a delay in presidential elections to gain time to find ways of sidelining Arafat.

The parliamentary challenge move did not immediately endanger Arafat's leadership or appear to be organized by any individual challenger.

However, it was a blow to his prestige and reflected a groundswell of anger among a Palestinian public tired of years of corruption and mismanagement.

Salah Taameri, a member of Arafat's Fatah movement who has known the Palestinian leader for 36 years, said he had never before opposed Arafat but joined the wave of discontent "so he knows how serious we are."

At the same time, no one at the session called on Arafat himself to step down — even though the United States and Israel have made clear that after two years of Mideast violence, they no longer consider him a partner for peacemaking. Critics tended to blame Arafat's aides, and not the longtime leader himself.

While many Palestinians find fault with Arafat, they say they resent U.S. efforts to try to push him aside and chafe at meddling in their affairs.

None of the central figures in the Palestinian leadership have said they would run against Arafat. One key figure — militia leader Marwan Barghouti — is in an Israeli prison, and another, parliament speaker Ahmed Qureia — did not play a major role in Wednesday's parliamentary challenge.

6 police officers injured in raid at suspected al-Qaeda hide-out; 2 militants killed, others captured in 3-hour battle

By Zarar Khan
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

KARACHI, Pakistan — Police commandos fought a pitched battle with al-Qaeda suspects holed up in an apartment Wednesday, with combat spilling out onto adjoining rooftops. Two suspects were killed and five captured in the fighting, as Pakistan stepped up pressure on the remnants of the terrorist movement a year after it made its mark on the world.

Six officers, including two intelligence agents, were wounded when police stormed the top-floor apartment and the rooftop where the gunmen held out against hundreds of troops in the street and on the roofs of nearby apartment blocks. Two of the wounded were reported in critical condition.

Police said one of the dead militants and one of those arrested were Arabs, but their nationalities were not known.

The rest were Afghans, he said.

The federal Interior Ministry in Islamabad confirmed all the gunmen were foreigners but released no further information.

Police seized a laptop computer and "literature," plus an arsenal of assault rifles, submachine guns, pistols and hand grenades, said an intelligence agent on the scene. He spoke on condition of anonymity.

In a separate raid in Karachi on Wednesday, Pakistani security forces arrested five Islamic militants suspected of planning terrorist attacks on American fast-food restaurants in the city. All five men were members of a splinter group of Harkat-ul-Mu-jahedeen, or Movement of Holy Warriors, who had received weapons training in Afghanistan, police said.

Pakistani authorities said this week they have captured 402 al-Qaeda activists since the start of the war on terrorism. Most have been turned over to U.S. authorities for questioning.

enter, he typically used force to get through windows, Grubbs said.

Grubbs said the entire Riley County uniformed patrol and two detectives assisted in the search, which began when police responded to a report of a white male allegedly attempting to enter a residence at 2114 Walnut, shortly after midnight Tuesday.

The suspect escaped on foot, Grubbs said, but police later identified a vehicle with a stolen tag in the area where Jones was staying in Manhattan.

"At 7:00 a.m. on the 10th, a vehicle was stolen from 2901 Stagg Hill, taken over to Junction City and abandoned on Grand Avenue," Grubbs said. "The theory is, on our part, that he stole the car at 2901 Stagg Hill, used it as transportation to Junction City and abandoned it."

Officers found jewelry, a 9 mm pistol and a 1996 Nissan at the apartment.

After the trial process, the property will be returned to owners, who will have to go through a property identification process.

"Through past reports, we have been able to verify nearly all the items that have been recovered so far, and the victims of those crimes," Grubbs said. "Right now, it is evidence in a criminal trial, so they're not going to get those back right away."

Bill Kennedy, attorney for Riley County, said Jones' trial likely would take place in 3-6 months.

"Depending on his criminal history, his sentence on the first count could be anywhere from 11-34 months," Kennedy said. "The sentence on the rest of the felony counts could be 12 months each. Depending again on the situation, there could be sentences on any one of those, to be concurrent or consecutive."

Jones was in custody at the Riley County Police Department as of Wednesday evening. Bond has been set for $20,130.

Police canine detects scent of explosives inside office

By Andrew Welsh-Hugins
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Ohio — A 41-story state office tower that houses the Ohio Supreme Court was evacuated for about two hours Wednesday after dogs detected a scent of explosives and a man told a state worker, "I'm here to install a bomb," the State Highway Patrol said.

No explosives were found at the James A. Rhodes State Office Tower.

Patrol Lt. Col. Paul McClellan said the scent of material that can be used to make a bomb was detected in a van parked at a loading dock in the rear of the building, which is across the street from the Statehouse. Authorities had not identified the material.

The van driver was taken into custody and charged with inducing panic. McClellan said a state employee saw a man who looked out of place on the 28th floor, which houses personnel offices, and asked him what he was doing. He was there to "install a bomb," McClellan said.

The man had signed in at the building to make a delivery, McClellan said. It was not clear whether he did.

succeed, players say.

And if opponents aren't careful, the sophomore setter will dump the ball and score a kill. Guerre averages just over a kill per game, but seems to do it at the most opportune times for the Cats.

Part of that has to do with her height (6 foot 1 inch), Fritz said. The other part is because she is left-handed.

With these advantages,

Guerre has emerged as one of the top setters in the league, Fritz said. But she still has some growing to do.

"I would like her leadership to emerge more and I would like her to give more of herself, show more emotion to where she is making strong connections with her teammates," Fritz said. "That's an area of her game where when she goes and matures in the game, that area will have to grow with her."

Guerre said setting is more or less a science for her. She said she has grown a lot since last season, when she started 21 matches for the Cats.

Setting is different at different locations on the court, she said. The trick is not to let hitters get the feeling they are at a different location.

"If I'm in the middle of the court and the hit is on the outside, then I have to set the ball lower," Guerre said. "If the ball is on an eight, then I have to push it to no end so they don't have to wait on it.

"I have to make the adjustment so they don't have to."

So far, Guerre has done her job. K-State is 4-1, and two of the Cats' hitters are averaging more than three kills per game.

Fritz said a team can only be as good as its setter.

"Do I think she makes everyone else better around her?" Fritz said. "Yeah. She's our setter — that's her job."

A Changed People

Today marks the anniversary of what might remain the greatest tragedy of our lives.

One year ago, we were struck with shock and horror, but today, we will reflect and remember.

Today is Sept. 11, 2002, and this is how we've changed.

ONE YEAR LATER

September 11, 2002

"(Sept. 11) was kind of like a revelation in a sense, just showing us how there are people in the world that feel underappreciated. But it shows that there are some misunderstandings. And violence was the only acceptable way in their view to get their voice heard. People have learned to appreciate the little things — your family, those that are close to you. And maybe just to show a reverence. Try to embrace cultural difference because that's a big problem that I see."

Tramaine Watts

SENIOR IN HUMAN RESOURCE MANAGEMENT

"I was glued to the television set all day long, and I called my family right away and called my friends. All day I was watching the news and talking on the phone. I just think people are a lot more conscientious about the things they say and do, not just safety-wise but helping people out, learning how valuable every single person is."

Kari Strelcheck

SOPHOMORE IN SECONDARY EDUCATION

"I was in philosophy class. The philosophy instructor came in and said he had glanced it on the TV that some nut flew a plane into the World Trade Center. I got home and turned on the TV. The TV kept playing the scene. I saw them replay the towers falling, and I just saw that over and over again. When I really stop and think about it, that's what I see, and I will always remember those towers falling. It carries such deep meaning with it, all of us having shared it and experienced it just naturally brings us closer together."

Jeff Powell

SENIOR IN SOCIAL WORK

"Everybody was just in shock. I think a lot of people didn't know how to act because it wasn't exactly affecting us directly. Everybody is obviously more patriotic, a lot more respectful for other people and their backgrounds — where they're from, ethnicity, things like that."

Carolyn Denney

SOPHOMORE IN OPEN-OPTION

"People seem to have come together some, and then some people have drawn more further apart. There's racial profiling, people that are narrow-minded think, 'oh he's an Arab, he must have a bomb on him or something.'"

Jesse Franz

"On my way walking here, I saw most of the people in front of the big TV in the Union, and I thought 'OK, yeah, something surreal is happening.' I am Muslim, but I can't claim the belief that all those innocent people should die. Just because of that terrorist attack, the United States decided to start a war against terrorists, and this war has changed the whole world, the economy, and that war originated because of that attack, and it definitely affected all relationships in the world. It's continuing to affect it."

Community begins to heal, remember

Residents strive to cherish life, relationships year after 9/11

By Jessica Pitts

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The nation held its breath that day. And now it is slowly starting to exhale — but few seem to forget.

The day the terrorists slammed two planes into the World Trade Center, one into the Pentagon and one into a Pennsylvania field will forever be in America's memories — Sept. 11, the day the nation witnessed the murder of thousands of innocent people in their own country.

"How can you forget?" said Mallory Malone, K-State senior in financial management who lives only 30 minutes from Ground Zero in New York City. "It was real and close to us. Our world changed, but it shouldn't just be on the east coast and Pennsylvania. It affects all of us everyday."

The world changed so much that a year later the patriotism is still in full force. The soldiers are still fighting terrorism.

The lines at airports are still longer and the country's finest — the firefighters and police officers — are still being held in high regard.

"It bumped us 180 degrees on our head," said Tony Jurich, K-State professor who has friends and family in New York and Washington, D.C.

And now, one year later, the shift is starting to turn, he said.

People are starting to heal, starting to move on, starting to adjust. But people will never forget.

"It makes you pause for thought," said Jennifer Bambach, who works for K-State Online and moved to Kansas from New York last April. "I go through every day remembering what happened and thanking God that I was here in Kansas and not in New York."

But while counting her blessings — including that a sorority sister who works in the Pentagon is alive today — Bambach is also remembering her losses — a former friend and co-worker who left behind a wife and child when he died in the World Trade Center.

And there is still more pain. Her boyfriend, a captain in the Army, is stationed in Fort Knox, Ky., right now waiting for the next military step in Operation Enduring Freedom.

"It affects me big time," she said. "The pictures don't show you half of what goes on down there. A friend told me that in one grade school class, 26 out of the 30 children had lost one or both parents. That reality is hard to handle."

And the reality of what happened a year ago today has changed America. Citizens have adjusted to a different way of life, although the changes might be less dramatic than they expected.

"I have begun to accept them," Malone said. "It just seems normal now."

The security searches at the airport took her by surprise when she flew last November, but when she made the trip home to New Jersey this summer, she didn't even think twice — it had become routine. While walking down Times Square in New York, Malone pays little attention to the police officers dressed in full gear and holding loaded weapons.

"It is normal," she said. "I know why they are there."

Jake George, senior in social science, sits on the porch with his roommate, Shawn Ward, senior in electrical engineering, Sunday night. The two were talking about since the Sept. 11 attacks, they have paid more attention to foreign policy.

Patriotic actions, symbols more prominent this year

Generations continue to feel pride in nation, being an American

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When army veteran Diana Chapel sees the American flag, she gets a lump in her throat. Since Sept. 11, her eyes well up with tears when the "Star Spangled Banner" is played.

"I was in the army for 22 years, so we have always been patriotic," Chapel said. "We have always hung our American flag. My husband has 100 flags he puts out for Memorial Day and the Fourth of July."

When she saw the planes crash into the World Trade Center a year ago, her love for America only grew stronger.

"I think it reinforced what we already felt," Chapel said. "It made us appreciate that much more what the military does, and firefighters and police officers. We are reminded once again how very important they are for us to enjoy the kind of life we have."

After Sept. 11, Manhattan was colored with red, white and blue, and candlelight vigils renewed the love for America's freedom and justice.

The terrorist attacks also reminded Todd Kohman, student body vice president, how grateful he is to live in the United States.

"I think my patriotism is high," he said. "I was still in shock the day afterward, and I didn't even know what was going on. I didn't know how to feel or who to be mad at."

"But now that it's been a year, I have had time to think about it. I am proud to be a citizen of the U.S. I am just happy to live in the greatest country in the world."

The weeks after the Sept. 11 attacks healed the hearts of Manhattan citizens. Flags on Poyntz Avenue flew at half mast and people were glued to their TVs.

And although most K-State students never felt the direct effects of having a loved one die in the attacks, the patriotic spirit has remained.

Shawn Ward, senior in electrical engineering, said he hasn't felt the effects personally, but hopes his generation and younger generations will realize the impact of these events.

"Hopefully the younger generation feels more strongly for how everyone has suffered, especially for the men defending our country against terrorism," Ward said.

But for a generation that had never sent its brothers and sisters off to war or been witness to an attack on American soil before Sept. 11, the terrorist attacks made no less of an impact.

But for a generation that had never sent their brothers and sisters off to war or been witness to an attack on American soil before Sept. 11, the terrorist attacks made no less of an impact.

Kathryn Mock, 8, said she now likes to draw pictures of the American flag as she remembers the two planes crashing into the World Trade Center.

"It makes me feel proud to be an American," she said.

At school, Mock said her class now sings the "Star Spangled Banner" and recites the "Pledge of Allegiance" every morning.

Sara Boatman, 11, has been memorizing facts about the United States and singing patriotic songs at her school. She said she is proud to be an American after what happened, but it is still sad when she thinks of the victims of the attacks.

"I feel better than I did then," she said. "I felt kinda depressed."

Showing patriotism was always important for Blair Fahrny, 13, but after the Sept. 11 attacks, she said she now understands why she wears her red, white and blue.

"I just wore shirts with American flags - I really wasn't into all that stuff," Fahrny said. "I still wear a lot of stuff, but I guess I understand what it means more. It's believing in what your country stands for."

"It's a great place. I love it."

Attendance surges at churches; pastors field spiritual questions

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He was supposed to be out of town.

But when Father Keith Weber, of St. Isidore Catholic Student Center, heard the news Sept. 11, he canceled all plans. He knew he would be needed. People had questions, people needed comfort, and people needed spiritual support.

That night, there were 400 people at Mass, Weber said.

His congregation was stunned, he said. And angry. And sad.

They turned to him for strength.

"It was comforting knowing that people really did turn to God in times of crisis," Weber said of his role that day. "And to really know that they could depend and trust in God to help them."

Church attendance was higher in the next few days and weeks, he said. And faith was stronger.

"People's faith became stronger because they one, had to look at how to deal with this issue with God, and two, they realized how fragile life really is," he said. "So they appreciated each day a little more."

Attendance surged at other local churches, too. Nationwide, it became a trend after Sept. 11.

Pastor David Thompson, of Westview Community Church, said people have changed spiritually since that day. They are reprioritizing aspects of their life that affect spirituality, like family time, he said. They also are making more time for spiritual activities.

"We have seen more of a seriousness about life and awareness, and the fundamental values of what life is all about," he said. "People are more willing to get involved and help other people."

Thompson said immediately after the attacks, there was a tremendous wave of prayer support and an outpouring of love. People who did not like to talk about spirituality wanted to talk.

There were a lot of questions, he said, such as the following: Why did this happen? Where was God on Sept. 11? How can we help?

Sunday morning after the attacks, Thompson addressed these in his sermon. But people still have some questions, he said, bigger questions that stemmed from Sept. 11.

"It's the same basic question that mankind has wrestled with forever, and that's the whole question of why does God allow things to happen?" he said.

Beth Plummer, sophomore in family studies, said she was confused just like everyone else that tragic Tuesday, but the past weekend and what plans they had for the upcoming week. Both students said that I'm not an American (but it's still) so sad every time I think about it, the pain about it. Those families are permanently destroyed. Every time I thought about it, it's really very hard. I kept reading stories online. There are so many stories about it, the callings in the towers at the last minute to the families, saying, like 'I love you' and 'take care of our daughter.' It's so moving — the people jumping from the building — so many stories."

Soldier's personal, work life altered

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The life of one Fort Riley soldier will never be the same. One year later, he continues to feel the affects in his professional life and in his personal life.

At 19 years old, Spc. Michael Huddleston knows he's doing what's right for himself and his country, even if it means being deployed. Even if it means risking his life. Even if his life is forever changed.

That realization hasn't been easy, especially this year.

"No one could understand what this year has been like for soldiers - for me," Huddleston said.

Sept. 11, 2001

Huddleston was in the field doing training exercises. In between missions, word came that the World Trade Center had been bombed.

"I just pictured planes coming and dropping bombs on us," he said. "I just knew we were going to war, and I thought it would be right away."

More details began to come in. Planes had hit the WTC, and then the Pentagon.

Huddleston said he thought it was a mistake.

He had grown up believing, as many others did, that America was invincible.

He said it was like a bad dream. But eventually he had to deal with the fact that America had been attacked.

"I was never scared," Huddleston said. "Right away I was angry. I wanted to pack up and go to Afghanistan."

He wasn't deployed, but he was given orders to guard the gates at Fort Riley.

Traffic was backed up for miles as cars piled up to get on base. Identification had to be shown. Civilians had to have a reason to be on base or they were turned away.

Christie Vanover, spokesperson for Fort Riley, said the number of open gates was reduced to five. Security measures will remain the way they are now, forever.

"Those of us who were on gate guard pretty much lived at the battery the first few days," he said.

The aftermath

Days turned into months, and eventually the rush to get on base calmed.

Although the base was calming, Huddleston's life wasn't.

He spent more time on base then he did at home. And he was prepared to go fight a war in Afghanistan.

His wife missed him. She was worried about him. And eventually it was more than the two could take.

"There was a lot of stress on my marriage for those few months, and I ended up getting a divorce because of it," Huddleston said. "It's been quite a year."

His personal life isn't the only thing that's been affected. Everything is different, he said.

"I'm more ready than ever to go and fight this war," he said. "It's hard to think about being deployed and the thought of dying, but that's my job. If I'm called, I will go without hesitation."

Fort Riley has mobilized more than 500 troops to deployment for Operation Enduring Freedom, the war against terrorism, and Operation Noble Eagle, the mission to achieve homeland security.

About 150 Fort Riley soldiers were deployed in April to guard the Pentagon. A handful of other soldiers who have specialties have been called to active duty since Sept. 11.

A changed base

Huddleston said the mood on base changed on Sept. 11.

But after a day like that, he said, you would expect to see changes.

"People are a little jumpier and more on the edge," he said. "I wouldn't say they were scared, just ready for anything to happen."

Patriotism was much more noticeable, Vanover said. The soldiers deployed for separate missions on Sept. 11 felt a stronger sense of worth.

"I do believe that the soldiers felt a very strong sense of purpose in defending America at that time," Vanover said.

That purpose hasn't been lost in the year since the attacks, Huddleston said.

"When you're in the chow hall, you overhear people talking. People are saying 'let's go,'" he said. "People want to end this, right now."

Huddleston said soldiers are honored that America has taken more notice of the military's work and dedication since last year.

"I've always been proud to be in the army, but since Sept. 11, other people recognize us more," he said.

"We are here so that America can go to bed at night. They can rest knowing that we are here to protect them if anything happens. And that's what I've always wanted to do."

CHANGES | Manhattan residents affected by 9/11

But there also have been some changes for the better. People are more accepting of others, Malone said. They treasure each day and are spending more time with loved ones.

"It is an amazing thing to see the amount of patriotism that has come out of this horrible act," she said. "It is everywhere. People are adjusting."

Although not everyone in Kansas was directly affected by the terrorist attacks, Fred Newton, director of Counseling Services, said there was a sense of horror throughout the nation because the attacks were broadcast live on television.

"It hit everyone," he said. "We were able to sit there and watch it unfolding right before our eyes."

And whether there was a direct link or a general feeling, Newton said the response was similar.

"We all know this is horrible," he said. "There is no question that we were affected and that it has changed people's lives. There was a sense of general anxiety after the events. Now people are starting to accept a new shift in the way we lead our lives."

That acceptance still worries Bambach. She wants people to remember even if they were not affected directly.

"Honestly, I think it is easy to forget because we are not there," she said. "In New York, pictures and stories still line the walls. People still talk about it. We need to think about the police officers and fireman who give up their lives to protect us. And we need to remember the people that died."

"I think the biggest thing is that we don't forget the soldiers because they are still fighting for us. This hasn't ended for them - they live with the reality daily," she said. "We need to tell them we appreciate them. We need to remember."

FAITH | Community turns to spirituality for strength

her faith gave her comfort.

"I didn't question my faith because of it. I knew God had a plan for it, and I knew that everything would work out," she said. "I knew God was in control."

She said it gave her an opportunity to share her faith with others, because they were scared and had questions.

"When people's worlds get shaken, they start to realize they aren't in control of everything," she said.

Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities, said Sept. 11 also caused students to begin searching for and questioning the meaning of life and death.

Some even changed their majors, he said, to ones they felt could make a difference in the world.

"Those questions have been raised, and we are going to be living with those for a long time - questions about death, spirituality and the meaning of life," Fallon said.

Questions about other religions also arose. An open house at the local mosque gave the community an opportunity to learn about Islam.

Mohammad Al-Deeb, president of the Muslim Student Association, said the mosque received more visitors in one day than in six years. But the new awareness was not worth the tragedy, he said.

"Even if it made people kinder," he said. "It wasn't worth the lives lost."

Thompson said in the past year, there has been more of a sense of community and awareness than ever before.

"I have seen the country become more united, and there is certainly more of a feeling of 'God Bless America,'" he said.

"Al-Qaeda might have meant this as an evil, but God has used this as a good in people's lives."

Sorority to raise money

Greek car wash to help Kemp scholarship

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A car wash Friday from 1 to 5 p.m. at the Pi Beta Phi sorority house will kick off a campaign to raise money for the Ali Kemp Pi Beta Phi Scholarship fund.

Kemp, a freshman at K-State last year, was found by her father in a Leawood, Kan., swimming pool's pump room suffering from severe head injuries and was declared dead at the hospital. Her death was ruled a homicide. A composite sketch was released of the suspect, but no one has come forward.

The Pi Phi scholarship fund is in addition to a fund started this summer, which has raised more than $50,000 through memorial walks, car washes and door-to-door donations. A golf tournament in Kemp's name is planned for mid-October, which will include Kansas City Chiefs and Royals athletes.

However, Kemp's sorority sisters decided to set up their own fund.

"This one is going to be through Pi Phi," Erin O'Brien, sophomore in education, said. "It's something we all decided we wanted to do from the house."

O'Brien said there is no specific goal for the fund, but to raise as many funds as possible.

"Our only goal is to do the best we can," she said. "We aren't setting a goal. We just want it well-known to the public because it could happen to anyone."

Bush tells world leaders to confront 'grave danger'

By Ron Fournier
ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Raising the specter of war, President Bush told skeptical world leaders Thursday to confront the "grave and gathering danger" of Saddam Hussein's Iraq — or stand aside as the United States acts. Hesitant allies asked him not to go it alone.

From the United Nations' cavernous main hall, filled with wary friends and one bitter foe in Iraq's ambassador, Bush said the body must rid the world of Hussein's biological, chemical and nuclear arsenals or risk millions of lives in a "reckless gamble."

Behind the scenes, U.S. diplomats reported progress toward a U.N. resolution giving Iraq a firm deadline — just weeks away — to disarm or face dire, but thus far unspecified, consequences.

"If Iraq's regime defies us again, the world must move deliberately and decisively to hold Iraq to account," Bush said in his 15-minute address. "The just demands of peace and security will be met or action will be unavoidable. And a regime

City underbills golf course

Colbert Hills to pay for Manhattan's meter mistake

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For three years, the city of Manhattan has been underbidding Colbert Hills Golf Course for its water — by about 10 times.

In July, city officials realized that the water meter readings during the past three years were read incorrectly, making the water bill significantly lower than what it should have been, Bernie Hayden, director of city finance said.

As a part of their own operations, K-State placed the 6-dial water meter at the golf course three years ago. At the same time, water readers from the city were informed that it was to be read as a 5-dial meter, thus making each reading lower than what it actually was, Hayden said.

"In essence, everything read one-tenth of what it really was," he said.

However, Hayden said the city is taking the blame for the error and trying to come up with a plan for the repayment process.

"It was our fault, and we feel that is was an embarrassment," he said. "The golf course didn't have any qualms. They understand that they were using that amount of water."

David Gourley, Colbert Hills director of golf course operations, said the facility realizes that an error was made and will reimburse the city for the money loss after the final finances are agreed upon.

"I think there's always mistakes made," he said. "If we owe, certainly we'll do what's right with the

Distractions, entertainment stealing students' sleep time

By Amy Preston

Ken Eilert, sophomore in biology and pre-medicine, has a problem.

Every night when he tries to go to sleep, something else comes up, and he finds himself going to bed hours later.

"There are so many distractions," Eilert said. "I just entertain myself because I can't get to sleep."

Eilert is not alone. According to an April 2002 poll by the National Sleep Foundation, a trend of sleeping less is sweeping the nation.

A Contagious Trend

Today, more and more college students are finding themselves not getting an adequate amount of sleep, leading to sleep deprivation, said Art Rathbun, Lafene Health Center counselor and biofeedback specialist.

"Everybody has different sleep needs," he said. "Some of us can work on six hours of sleep while others can on seven hours. A majority of us need eight hours of sleep each night."

However, students are finding that sleep comes later on their list of things to do each evening.

"Students have a lot of things on their minds," Rathbun said. "Many who have demanding schedules probably put more hours into studying and less into sleeping."

Eilert finds this to be true, especial-

Enrollment growth filling lecture halls to brim; teachers using new methods

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's 10:50 a.m. and hundreds of restless students are pressed into the crowded lobby outside Umberger 105. The largest-class on campus, Introduction to Human Development, is about to begin — and seating is scarce.

As enrollment increases each fall, lecture halls are being filled to capacity. The largest halls on campus, Umberger 105, Cardwell 101 and Seaton 63, with seating capacities of 483, 339 and 259 respectively, are used to educate hundreds of students at once, providing a challenge for instructors and students.

Umberger 105 is designed for 483 students. However, 495 students enrolled in human development are scheduled to utilize the room every Tuesday and Thursday morning. This poses a problem for Kelly Welch, assistant professor in family studies and human services, who teaches the class.

velopment class, with almost 1,000 people in its two sections, is overcrowded.

"I have extensive wait lists every semester, and it's frustrating," Welch said. "It's frustrating to know you can't meet student needs."

Overcrowding also creates a teaching challenge for Welch.

"It's more difficult to teach large sections because of the energy demands," Welch said. "In a class that size, every type of learning style is represented. I try to tailor activities throughout the semester to address each learning style."

Sarah Burdick, sophomore in business, said she prefers smaller classes, but she said Welch keeps her human development class interesting.

Camaraderie between administrators increased during Staff Olympics event

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Staff members and administrators enjoyed a day of activities and a break from work yesterday at the first Staff Olympics event.

"I think this is a good break," said Sandi Adams, a secretary from the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

The event was organized by the Staff Development Committee, which is made up of administrators and staff, in an effort to promote staff well-being, said Carla Jones, senior assistant dean of student life and chairwoman of the staff development committee.

"This promotes camaraderie and teamwork between staff and administrators," Jones said. "I believe it helps people work better together and be more productive."

The staff members were split into seven teams including the Basement Dwellers, Bob's Birdies, Hall or Nothing, Kedzie Killers, Psychos, Lifers, and the Untouchables.

The teams competed in several events including frisbee, basketball, volleyball and putt-putt golf.

The Staff Olympics were at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Pat Bosco, dean of student life and member of the Bob's Birdies, said he thought the olympics were a positive event.

"This is mentally as well as physically challenging," Bosco said. "I see a lot of smiles, so I think it was a good experience."

Jones said students will benefit from today's events when the staff comes back from spending the day together.

"The number one benefit is that teamwork helps people to be more satisfied in the job setting and in turn makes things less confusing for students," she said. "Having groups working together is good for students."

Adams, a member of the Untouchables, said she enjoyed the chance to interact with co-workers on a more personal level.

"We've never played around with these types of activities together," she said while cheering for a teammate doing well. "We have learned a lot about one another."

Bosco said the involvement outside the office is one of the best things about the event.

"This is an incredible group of staff that work long hours," he said. "This is a chance to put a name to a face and develop friendships."

CLASSES | Technology integral in students' success

"If I were having problems with a class, it would be a lot more comforting if the teacher knew who I was, but in bigger classes, it just isn't possible," Burdick said.

She said large classes require more initiative from students.

"In really large classes, you're kind of a number, so it's more your responsibility to get everything done," she said.

Professors like Welch often use technology classrooms to communicate with students.

Tim Bagby, manager at the Information Technology Assistance Center, said the 28 technology classrooms contain a videocassette recorder, high-tech computer, visual presenter, sound system with portable microphone, a wireless mouse and other equipment.

Welch said she hopes students can access more technology in the future.

"Research shows that in the traditional lecture format, students only remember about 10 to 20 percent of what they hear," she said. "Instead, I'd like to see students using the computer to not only enhance the learning experience but to reduce costs as well."

Bagby said he is familiar with the demand.

"An increasing number of faculty has come to rely on technology, but resources are scarce," he said. "It's not hard to imagine a time when we may not be able to accommodate those needs."

New program intended to help unite American, international students

Advertising, event planning among the many items on club's agenda

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

International and American students soon will have more opportunities for interaction.

The International Ambassador Program, a student-run organization that began this semester, will create activities for both international and American students to partake. The goal, organizers said, is to better the experience of international students.

"We wanted to provide more services for international students, just ways to make them feel more welcome, ways to give them a better American experience, and we also wanted to make American students aware of people around them at K-State," said Jessica Linenberger, program assistant for international programs.

The group's first meeting was Tuesday, and they will meet biweekly. Linenberger said executive positions and exact committees have not been formed yet. Specifics will be worked out in about two weeks, she said.

"Everything is up in the air," she said. "It's just a brainstorming phase."

Linenberger said the organization stemmed from an international buddies group, which pairs a foreign exchange student with an American student.

K-State has about 70 foreign exchange students and more than 1,000 international students, she said.

Participants in the ambassador program will meet weekly in Aggieville, either at a pub or coffee house.

Possible activities, Linenberger said, include going to the Renaissance Festival, touring the football stadium, visiting the Konza Prairie, and having a Halloween dance. They also discussed making a trip to a local farm or staying the night at a fraternity or sorority to experience greek life.

The program also will advertise for items many international students need, such as phones, bikes and linens.

Sarah Albrecht, international buddy and senior in anthropology, attended the program's first meeting. She said her study-abroad experience in Costa Rica drove her to get involved with K-State's international programs.

"I appreciated it when people there invited me along, so I wanted to reciprocate that," she said.

The newest program will be very beneficial to international students, Albrecht said.

"It'll be a good avenue to meeting people," she said.

Couple to share experiences from Afghanistan

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A husband and wife team who recently traveled to Afghanistan will discuss their experiences and display photographs during "Images of Afghanistan," which they will present at 7 tonight at the International Student Center.

The presentation is part of the annual meeting and social gathering for the Flint Hills Chapter of the United Nations Association of the United States of America, an organization dedicated to strengthening the United Nations system and enhancing U.S. participation in it.

"These pictures are fascinating," speaker Dan Talab, president of the chapter, said "and for somebody who doesn't have the opportunity to be there, these pictures are a great display of the condition of life and the way that people live in Afghanistan."

Talab said he has visited the country multiple times since the 1970s for projects he works on.

He speaks the native language and has weekly contact with people there.

During his trip in May, his wife, Rosemary, joined him.

Rosemary, professor of secondary education, said they took some video footage and hundreds of still images while in Kabul and Mazar-e-sharif. There will be images from hospitals, landmines and everyday Afghan life.

"Just a slice of life in Kabul and in Mazar-e-sharif," she said.

"Some of that's good, and some of that's bad."

"A lot of them are starving, but they are good people, and it's a beautiful country, or the remnants of it. There's not much that doesn't have bullet holes."

She said the pair also will address the history, development and current conditions of the country.

"He's been there enough that I think at this point in time we have a reasonable reflection to offer," Rosemary said.

Admission is free and refreshments will be provided. The presentation will last about 30 minutes, and people are welcome to stay for the remainder of the meeting.

Rosemary said students interested in Afghanistan should attend the presentation.

"If they want to know more about that part of the world, not from an Afghani position, but from someone who's been there a few times and has weekly contact," she said, "then they might want to come see what's going on."

Afghan head of state addresses General Assembly, pleads for financial help

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — As the first Afghan head of state to address the General Assembly in more than a decade, Hamid Karzai used his time at the microphone to ask the world's leaders for what his country needs most: cash.

The Afghan president spoke Thursday of his administration's achievements, but said donor countries needed to make good on their financial pledges so his country can meet its greatest challenges.

While international donors promised the huge sums for reconstruction at the January meeting in Japan, only a fraction of that — an estimated $100 million — has reached Afghanistan.

Donors say they want to see more stability before handing over additional sums, and Karzai assured them all that Afghanistan was moving away from its recent past.

Karzai took the time in his remarks to thank those who helped free Afghanistan from the clutches of the Taliban.

The last Afghan head of state to address the General Assembly was Fazle Haq Haliqar in 1991, the U.N. spokesman's office said. At that time, he represented a communist-style regime left in place after the Soviets withdrew from the country.

TO THE POINT Students should meet professors in the middle

Professors of large classes shouldn't be the only ones making an effort to better students' educations.

When class sizes start to spiral out of control and instructors find themselves outnumbered 500 to 1, students need to realize it is their responsibility to work with the instructors to turn a situation that could be viewed as negative into a positive one.

With large classes, it is virtually impossible for every student to receive one-on-one attention from the professor. Therefore, both the student and professor need to make the amount learned in the course a top priority.

This could involve faculty making an extra effort to extend office hours, or students continually keeping in contact with their instructors about assignments, tests and due dates.

If students are communicating with their professors, and vice versa, those professors will learn the names and habits of the students, making it easier to advise appropriate solutions.

It will also help instructors adjust their classes to meet the needs of their students. And that is the most important challenge, especially during a time when students' needs are seldom met elsewhere.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

WAR ON CIGARETTES

People who want to smoke should not fear punishment from government

The public perceives smokers as unhealthy, foul-smelling, air-polluting scum suckers.

And that really bothers me.

The trend today is to frown on those who cling to this nasty habit. For this reason, restaurants and even bars in many states have declared their businesses as "non-smoking facilities." Recently, K-State passed a new policy, which requires smokers to be at least 30 feet from select entryways. Fines are issued to violators of the policy.

Why should people be allowed to smoke, period?

From TV commercials comparing cigarettes to rat poison and posters on school walls, we all know the consequences of smoking. It kills thousands of Americans, but people are still sparking it up.

If smoking is the anti-Christ, why is it still legal?

Because the government is banking off your bad habit.

When cigarettes went up a staggering 65 cents per pack, smokers tried to kick the habit. Yeah, right. Trying to quit smoking is like deciding you're not going to eat anymore because it costs too much.

Believe me, I've tried.

Politicians are much smarter than the credit we give them. Why do you think they raised taxes on gasoline and cigarettes? They know these are things some Americans can't give up.

I would like to personally stick my boot up the next politician's rear who goes after tobacco companies for making cigarettes so addictive, then turns around and skyrockets the tax on them. The legislators would like the public to believe they actually care, but they take advantage of a constituency enslaved by an immensely addictive drug.

Americans are proud of their country because it represents freedom.

Therefore, if people want to eat 20 pounds of red meat, drink a keg of beer, smoke a carton of cigarettes and sit on the couch all day, they should go for it. Granted, the public should be educated about the effects of these practices. But after they've been educated, it's their decision whether they want to kill themselves, not the government's.

Raising cigarette taxes to promote health and public safety would be like raising the price of doughnuts for fat people - it's not fair.

Smoking is terrible. The fear of lung cancer and the trauma of climbing a flight of stairs and not being able to breathe is punishment enough. With this information alone, you would think everyone would quit smoking. However, legislators pretend that raising taxes to pad the budget will give smokers a sudden epiphany to quit.

If emphysema doesn't stop someone, a tax hike will not do the trick.

The only thing the higher prices are going to do are make smokers poor, as well as unhealthy.

Don't get me wrong. People should not be allowed to smoke just anywhere because they are paying high taxes. For instance, hospitals - bad places to smoke. Rest homes - bad places to smoke.

But people should be allowed to smoke in bars.

Even some "non-smokers" like to have a cigarette when they drink. Let's be realistic about the situation - non-smokers have public buildings, buses, airplanes and now some restaurants to breathe semi-clean air. I think the least we can do is allow people to smoke in bars.

If cigarette taxes are continuously going to increase, every cent of the money should be given to the school system. The schools can then take this money and use it for programs educating children on the dire effects of smoking.

I don't care if it works or not. If the government is going to claim it is raising the cigarette tax to help people kick the habit, it should be forced to use the funds to convince people to never start.

Next time you see a smoker, instead of turning up your nose in disdain, turn around and thank them for taking the fall for politicians who can't balance a budget.

Student government 101: syllabus provides guide for getting involved

Course name - Student Governing Association Experience
Instructors - Zac Cook, student body president and Todd Kohman, student body vice president

Course description - In this course, the instructors will seek student input in the process of government. They will act as the executive heads of a "Student Governing Association," or SGA.

Together, the instructors and students will attempt to develop plans to solve problems confronting the student body. Students will have ample opportunity to make their opinions known.

The course will be divided into three sections: old business, new business and perennial business.

Old business - The most significant issue of last year's presidential platform was the Safe Ride proposal.

Both Cook and Kohman have pledged to continue supporting the program, which would provide a safe late-night transit system for students.

New business - Last spring, the Cook-Kohman platform revolved around four critical points: international programs, voter registration, open-door policy, and recycling programs.

International programs

This was the chief issue of the campaign. Cook's initial goals were to expand the available programs and provide more scholarships to support international experiences. He suggested a $1-per-student privilege fee to support this.

Also, to increase interest in these opportunities, he proposed adding an international studies emphasis to every undergraduate program. Cook's long-term goal is to raise the number of students per year with international experience from 1 to 25 percent by 2008.

Cook's and Kohman's interest in supporting exchange programs goes both ways, too. After winning the election, Cook began making plans for a shuttle system to bring in new students from other countries. The proposed service would transport them from Kansas City International Airport back to campus.

Voter registration

It became clear after last spring's election fiasco why it is important for more students to become politically active. To increase students' awareness and make it easier for them to register, Kohman proposed registration booths in the K-State Student Union.

The pair also planned to add registration to freshmen and transfer-student orientation.

Open-door policy

After being elected, Kohman said, "We want to make it ... so students can feel like they can walk right past the secretary and see us without making an appointment."

This policy is not just limited to Manhattan students, however.

Cook and Kohman wrote a bill that, if passed, would move a Student Senate meeting to K-State-Salina, the first step in improving communication between the two campuses.

Recycling programs

Cook planned to throw his support behind the recycling program under development by Students for Environmental Action. The pair wants the university to be at the forefront of campus recycling.

Perennial business - Some issues have faced K-State for years and will continue to do so in the years to come. During the campaign, Cook and Kohman did not have much to say about how they planned to deal with existing long-term problems. Some of these include the parking situation, the state of student housing and the tuition increase.

Students are urged to hold them accountable on these issues, as well as those presented in their platform.

Grading policy - This course is not graded. The instructors realize each student will get out of this experience what he or she puts in. Only those who fail to participate will fail entirely.

Sources - Collegian articles dated Feb. 18, March 5, March 26, March 28, March 29 and June 7 provided information for the above statements, and can further help students develop their own ideas for political debate.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

We use spirit fingers because we don't have keys. Deal with it.

Someone should tell President Bush that it's pronounced "nu-clee-ar," not, "nu-cu-lar."

It is extremely disrespectful that the cartoon "America!" is making fun of our country on the anniversary of our most tragic day. Way to go, Collegian.

If Paul White wants to talk about conspiracy, maybe he should pay attention to the fact that all three of those cartoonists happen to be JJ Duncan's best friends, who, by the way, is the A&E editor.

Hi, this is a voluptuous fox, and you guys are no more appealing to me than a crusty rectal thermometer.

From all of the professors to Amber Koehn: Thank you for finally saying what has needed to be said for a long time. Keep up the good work.

As columnist Amber said, "We always must remember to obey the Golden Rule." There are two parts to the Golden Rule: Do unto others before they do unto you, and he who has the gold makes the rules.

I would also like to congratulate the Collegian, because as we all know, all K-State students speak Spanish.

Thank you Amber Koehn for bringing a brain back to the Collegian.

I'm fed up with being taken advantage of by this university. When I'm a rich alum, K-State won't get a dime from me.

I'd be a little more inclined to side with Bush on the Iraq issue if he'd actually learn to pronounce the word "nuclear."

The opinions published in the special edition Sept. 11 part of the Collegian were absolutely offensive. You shouldn't put non-sympathizers in a commemorative piece because it just makes us feel worse.

How about instead of having a candlelight vigil, we have a Camel Light vigil?

Eric Crouch retiring? It's just another example of a Nebraska football star doing absolutely nothing in the NFL.

What is up with the Beach Museum of Art? Illustrations from children's books and 40 demoniac heads in one room together - that's really de-mented.

To the person wondering whether the pizza delivery guy is going to spit in your pizza: we do keep track of who the chronic non-tippers are.

After reading Joel Reichenberger's column, I'm pretty sure he wants to sleep with the entire K-State football team.

Screw The Schwag. We want Swamp Donkey.

Those who model nude for art classes are definitely compensating for something they don't have, like money.

First of all, the football players don't get paid here, and whoever was talking about watering the sidewalks also mentioned that. And, cat-le don't get West Nile virus.

Paul White, face it. Bush won, Gore lost. Stop complaining. Your comic sucks.

My car is an unmarked shaggin' wagon. Do pull me over.

How come all the nice, hot girls have rings on their fingers?

Hey freshmen: I don't care how popular you were in high school, and neither does anybody else. Get over yourselves.

I was wondering if greeks wore underwear that said what house they were in.

Good neighbors shouldn't park large RVs in front of their house. Plus, it's against city ordinance.

Don't you think if George Bush was actually the mastermind behind the attacks and was able to keep it from the world's most important leaders, he'd be able to keep it from some dumb-ass cartoonist?

I was just wondering, if Jimmy cracked corn and nobody cared, why did he keep doing it?

My roommate is a neat freak and I hate him.

TO THE EDITOR

Comic offensive, authors should show more respect

Editor,

I was appalled and offended to see a comic strip that illustrated how you could fold a $20 bill to see the twin towers and pentagon burning.

It seems Paul White and Brent Engstrom were making light of a situation that resulted in the death of thousands of innocent lives.

The worst part of it all is that the strip was run on Sept. 11, a day in which we should respect our country and stand behind President Bush. I realize newspaper columnists, and even sub-par comic strip writers, are allowed to say whatever they feel, but it saddens me to know there are people who do not have the decency to respect this most tragic day.

I urge my fellow students to stop reading this sordid comic strip.

K-State salutes Ft. Riley

Students, residents to honor soldiers during Saturday's football game

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State plays Eastern Illinois on Saturday at KSU Stadium, there will be a special pregame salute to Fort Riley and its soldiers.

Fort Riley Day is an annual event to showcase soldiers, military heritage, equipment and commitment.

"K-State has had an annual Fort Riley Day to salute the soldiers and show them that they care and to thank them," said Scott Price, community relations officer at the base. "It is a really great thing K-State does to honor those at Fort Riley."

There will be multiple displays for the fans to witness around the stadium and a pregame ceremony.

"The fans at the game will get to see the Fort Riley Honor Guard, dismounted, and they will have their horses," said Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer at Fort Riley.

"They will also have a wagon along with them, and other displays will be available for them to see like a Humvee and weapon systems."

The 1st Brigade Combat team from the 1st Infantry is attending the game to help with the pregame ceremony.

"A five-man dismounting color guard will unfold the flags in the pregame," Sgt. 1st Class FFC and Platoon Sergeant of the Fort Riley Honor Guard Greg Sutton said. "They will be dressed in periodic uniforms from the Civil War era."

Discounted tickets for $16 are available at the base for soldiers or family members.

"Sometimes it is hard for a family of three or four to afford to go to a game," Price said. "With the special rates set for them at this game, they will be able to spend some time together and enjoy a football game."

This event is a way for K-State to show appreciation to Fort Riley, Price said.

"All surrounding communities have grown around us and we've tried to be good neighbors, and I think this is a good way to reach out to surrounding towns," Price said.

"We want to thank you and show you that the U.S. is in good hands."

Stretching before exercising is as basic as good table manners.

However, Christine Ferguson, kinesiology teaching technician, said not everyone does.

"This is probably why yoga has grown to such a mainstream appeal," she said.

Yoga, which means union, started as a Hindu religious form practiced in India about 5,000 years ago.

"Its main purpose was to strengthen bodies in order to sustain themselves long enough for hours in prayer," said Flora Nessly, yoga instructor at Yoga with Flora in Wichita.

Some people still practice yoga for the religious aspects, but now it has become a more mainstream form of exercise.

Nessly said she only teaches the exercises, not the religious aspect. She instructs 25 classes a week at various fitness centers in Wichita.

"It has since evolved and is recognized for its stretching value," she said.

Other focuses of yoga include improving overall physical fitness, mental clarity, greater self-understanding, stress control and having a general well-being.

Another yoga myth is that yoga followers are vegetarians. "All people can do yoga,"

Yoga classes offered

The Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex offers four sessions of yoga per week.

■ Basic yoga
7:15 a.m., 8:15 a.m. on Tuesdays

■ Advanced yoga
8:25 a.m. Thursdays and 4:20 p.m. Sundays

The kinesiology department's LIFE program also offers three yoga sessions a week.

■ LIFE yoga
6:45 p.m. Mondays and Wednesdays, 10 a.m. Sundays

Nessly said. "You can be of any background. It's good for everyone."

Nessly said her classes focus on flow, sustaining and stretching.

"One of the main purposes is to regain flexibility," she said. "Other activities tighten the muscles. Stretching seems to be the one thing missing in sports and activities."

Ferguson said she agrees that athletes and fitness gurus seem less focused on stretching.

"They usually don't stretch on their own," she said.

One of the biggest emphases of yoga is in working core stabilizing muscles or any type of postural area such as the back and stomach, Ferguson said.

"Back problems seem to be the worst, along with other areas affected by poor posture and weak abdominals," she said.

Kirsten Johannesen, junior in apparel and textile marketing, works on yoga with her friend Heather Sommers, junior in public relations. "I started doing yoga because it helps with my back problems," Johannesen said.

The No. 1 problem why people visit doctors is back problems, Nessly said. More and more doctors are sending people to her for their physical problems, which are mainly caused by stress and tension.

"The physical benefits are noticeable," she said.

Yoga also has other beneficial effects besides strengthening.

Nessly teaches students at Wichita State University.

She said many of the students tell her yoga helps them relieve stress and tension.

"It gets everything flowing again," Nessly said. "It regains flexibility, strengthens muscle, and tones muscles and joints."

All ages of people, from children to seniors, can practice yoga, Nessly said.

"It is really good for children who are hyperactive. A couple of studies have shown that parents are sick of giving their kids drugs, so they turn to yoga," Nessly said.

The kinesiology department is host to the LIFE program, which is a student-run fitness program at the Natatorium.

Each kinesiology student involved coordinates a program. The programs are open to students, faculty and the community.

"Our programs are geared towards learning," Ferguson said.

National spotlight chock full of sports

Jayhawks, Tigers, Wildcats, Chiefs all making news

By Colby Gordon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another interesting sports week has passed us and another great weekend awaits.

In light of that, here are some random thoughts and predictions to help you through the next week, until we meet again.

— Former Defensive Coordinator Phil Bennett is off to a 0-2 start as the head coach at Southern Methodist University.

The Mustangs did play Texas Tech close, losing only 24-14 last week, but got drilled 38-7 by a terrible Navy team in their season opener.

Bennett's best chance for his first victory will be Oct. 5 against San Jose State, as SMU's next three games are on the road against TCU, Oklahoma State and Hawaii.

— SLAM Magazine has the K-State women's basketball team No. 3 in its preseason poll. The women will be good this year, but not that good. Somewhere between No. 8 and No. 12 would be a more accurate ranking.

In the men's poll Kansas is ranked first, with Oklahoma at No. 4 and Texas at No. 5. UT at No. 5? That's an exaggeration to say the least. Texas will be good this year, but not that good.

Perhaps the folks at SLAM should be reminded that the Longhorns lost to both K-State and Texas A&M last season.

— KU faces potential embarrassment Saturday if they lose to I-AA Southwest Missouri State. Last year, Kansas only beat the Bears 24-10, and the Jayhawks have not looked good in their first two games, not to mention offensive line coach Ken Conatser just left the team. SMS is 2-0 and just a few votes out of the Division I-AA top 25.

— Missouri football figures to be a factor in the Big 12 North this season. After whipping Illinois and Ball State, the Tigers should win their next two games and be 4-0 entering their Oct. 5 home game against Oklahoma.

Redshirt freshman quarterback Brad Smith has drawn comparisons to Michael Vick, and will be the biggest reason the Tigers make a statement in the conference.

— Can we really believe anything the Chiefs tell us any more?

Second-round pick Eddie Freeman did not even suit up for the home opener because he was supposedly overworked in training camp and is now burned out.

This comes after a training camp in which general manager Carl Peterson had been raving about how well Freeman was doing.

Question? If you're an NFL rookie, how can one month of football burn you out?

Ryan Sims apparently can go from "fat and out of shape," as Coach Dick Vermeil described him, to pretty good shape in a week and a half. Last Sunday, Sims played 28 snaps, and will play even more this week against Jacksonville.

Question everything that comes out of Peterson's and Vermeil's mouths from now on.

And there has been nothing but positive vibes around Kansas City after the Chiefs' miracle win in Cleveland.

Kansas City's defense is next to awful, especially the cornerbacks. And if Browns back-up quarterback Kelly Holcomb can shred your secondary, any decent offense will score tons of points on you.

— For the Kansas City Royals, the baseball season cannot end quick enough. According

CAT RACE

K-State to 'rehearse' in Topeka 1 more time

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State cross country team will compete Saturday in Topeka at the Wildcat Invitational.

As his runners prepare for their second event of the season, Coach Randy Cole said these early meets greatly benefit the team and help all of the runners learn to not just run, but learn to race.

"It's a dress rehearsal, going through meet procedure," Cole said. "Our runners will learn to have an individual race plan."

The Wildcats will take to the State-land Cross Country Course on the Old State Hospital Grounds on Saturday, making their second Topeka appearance in as many weeks.

K-State will be one of five teams in competition.

The Cats will be joined by regional rivals Kansas, Fort Hays State, Emporia State and out-of-state challenger Illinois-Chicago.

The invitational promises to add a new degree of difficulty for this season's squad, Cole said.

Last week's K-State Harrier Relays saw the Wildcat runners each running two miles.

On Saturday, though, the men will trek a 6,400-meter, 4-mile course, and the women will follow a 4,000 meter, 2.5 mile, trail.

The added distance is only a natural part of training for longer races later in the season, Cole said.

"They are getting used to the distance and used to keeping their pace up," Cole said. "They are ready to run it."

After week one, Cole said he was not surprised by the runners who emerged to lead the team.

On the women's side, senior Amy Mortimer, questing for her fourth All-American honor, led the K-State women and all other competitors with a time of 11:15 in the two mile.

This week she hopes to build upon her success and extend her lead, Cole said.

"She felt pretty good and didn't kill herself," he said.

"She did a good job over the summer and is looking to continue to build."

Derek George runs during the Harrier Relays in Topeka on Saturday. George and his teammate Bruno Garcia finished eighth in the relays with a combined four-mile time of 20:39.

Matt Stamey | COLLEGIAN

In hot pursuit will be freshman Erin Mortimer, Amy's sister, and Wildcat sophomore Trisha Culbertson.

Last weekend, Erin finished two seconds behind Amy, and Culbertson just five.

Mathew Chesang also did not disappoint on the men's side, and was able to lead the squad like Cole hoped he would be able to in the race.

Chesang finished with the top men's split, at 9:21.

Freshman Drew Tonniges also lived up to Cole's expectations. The freshman out of Kearney, Neb., ran a split time of 9:55.

"Drew did a nice job with workouts, and really was able to get himself stronger," Cole said.

The invitational also might mark the first race for Wildcat freshman Rodgers Kipchumba.

Kipchumba missed the first several weeks of practice after he experienced difficulty getting a student visa to come to the United States from Nairobi, Kenya. He is now in Manhattan and has been training for two weeks. Cole said Kipchumba is anxious to get his feet wet in competition.

"He might run. He was training back home so he is in pretty good aerobic shape," Cole said.

"He really wants to run, but he hasn't done much since he got here."

Saturday will be the last of what Cole refers to as the "preseason" meets.

On Sept. 21 the team travels to Minnesota for their first full-length race of the season.

Nevertheless, he said he only can hope that his team takes everything it can from these shorter, early meets.

"Everyone has a good attitude and we're pretty young," Cole said.

"We are learning the ropes, and it takes awhile for training to get set up. Saturday should be pretty fun, and a real nice opportunity."

Cats wrap up nonconference play

Volleyball puts No. 24 ranking on line during trip to Florida

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's volleyball team might be a little fatigued, Coach Suzie Fritz said, but that's not the reason they are heading south to Florida.

The 24th-ranked Cats (4-1) are participating in the USF Adidas Invitational tournament in Tampa, Fla., the team's final tune-up before Big 12 play.

But that's not to say the competition will be like it has been during the past four matches for K-State.

Fritz and company will take on South Florida tonight, then No. 19 Michigan State and Georgia Tech, who received votes in the latest volleyball poll, on Saturday.

It will be the Cats' first real challenge since Colorado State, K-State's first match of the season.

"This is a true test for our team," Fritz said. "This will be a competitive volleyball tournament, and it will give us a good indication of what kind of volleyball team we're going to be."

K-State's first test will be with South Florida. The host school, USF (5-2) is very similar to the Cats, Fritz said.

"They got voted for the top 25 and they're legitimate," Fritz said. "They're a ball control team, they won't make a lot of errors — just a solid team and when they don't have it, they're going to give it to you and try to cuff you. So we're going to have to be ready for that."

"Defensively they're doing some real similar things to us," Fritz said. "They're a bunch read team — that's really all we know about them."

The Cats never even faced off against against the Bulls — it's only their second visit to the state of Florida.

K-State participated in the Florida Sun Trust Invitational in Gainesville, Fla., back in 1998.

But Fritz said it doesn't matter if the team doesn't know its opponent well.

"We're never concerned with what other teams are doing," Fritz said. "We try not to look sideways — our focus is on playing well in the Big 12."

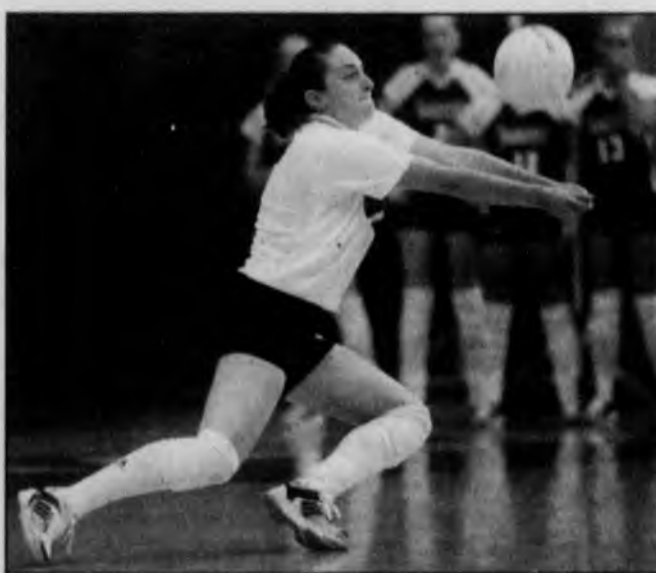

After playing South Florida on Friday evening, the Cats will turn around and play two matches on Saturday.

First up will be 19th-ranked Michigan State.

The Spartans (5-1) had a five-match winning streak going, but saw it go by the wayside when they lost to Wright State last weekend. Both K-State and MSU have played Western Michigan so far this season, and both won in three games.

The Cats will turn around after their match with the Spartans to play Georgia Tech. The Yellow Jackets (7-1) have won five in a row, and are coming off a first place showing at their own tournament.

Junior middle blocker Lau-

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

K-State's Laura Downey-Wallace dives to make a return hit at Sunday's game against Arkansas State. The next home match will be Sept. 18 against Nebraska.

ren Goehring said it will be nice to play some stiff competition, and see how K-State matches up with the better teams in the country.

The Cats have won four straight matches, all sweeps.

"The competition is going to be top-notch down there," Goehring said. "We're excited to get down there and play."

Fritz said playing weaker opponents hasn't hurt the Cats because they focus on getting in their own system, and whether they win or lose will depend on execution.

At the same time the team is trying to establish depth at every position. Despite the large number of freshmen, Fritz said, the Cats are close to where they want to be.

"I think we've solidified a basic core of people," Fritz said.

"We're not as deep as we would like to be, I don't think you ever are, but we like where we're at."

Players said they are excited to go to Florida because it will be a nice change of pace.

And although south Florida will be a bonus for the Cats, it won't be as nice if they can't play to their capabilities.

"I'm excited," setter Gabby Guerre said. "I think we'll bring home a nice trophy."

MLB | Royals drop day game to White Sox
Jon Garland allowed two hits in seven innings and Magglio Ordonez drove in two runs Thursday as the Chicago White Sox beat the Kansas City Royals 5-1.

Kansas City's only hits off Garland (11-11) were by Raul Ibanez, a second-inning home run and a fourth-inning single.

Garland improved to 3-1 in his last four starts, throwing 72 of 104 pitches for strikes.

Keith Foulke finished the three-hitter, allowing a single to Mike Sweeney.

Chicago's magic number for postseason elimination remained at three.

Ordonez increased his RBI total to 118, third in the American League. Alex Rodriguez began the day with 132 and Miguel Tejada with 119.

NFL | Crouch retires

Eric Crouch, the Heisman Trophy winner last year for Nebraska who tried to make the switch to wide receiver in the NFL, has decided to retire.

St. Louis Rams coach Mike Martz said Wednesday night that Crouch, the team's third-round pick in this year's draft, informed him of his decision last Friday.

Crouch did not make the trip to Denver for the team's opening game against the Broncos on Sunday and has not practiced with the team since then.

Martz has closed practices for the first three weeks of the season, and the Rams had not made an announcement.

NFL | Charges dropped against Russell

Prosecutors dropped their case against Oakland Raiders defensive tackle Darrell Russell on Thursday, claiming they could not prove he videotaped a woman being raped by two of his friends.

The 26-year-old Russell also had been charged with drugging the 28-year-old woman with the "date-rape drug" GHB at a San Francisco night club in January.

Russell was accused of holding a video camera and not intervening while his friends raped the woman.

Russell, a two-time Pro Bowler, was charged with 25 felonies as an accomplice in the alleged attack Jan. 31 at the home of one of Russell's teammates, safety Eric Johnson.

Police seized a videotape during the search of the home.

Prosecutors said Thursday it was their duty to drop the charges — not because they think Russell is innocent, but because they believe a jury would not convict him on current evidence.

NBA | Stackhouse traded to Washington

After leading the Detroit Pistons to a surprising turnaround season, Jerry Stackhouse will get a chance to do the same with the Washington Wizards.

The Pistons traded Stackhouse to the Wizards for Richard Hamilton in a six-player deal Wednesday.

Washington also gets forward Brian Cardinal and center Ratko Varda, while Detroit lands forward Bobby Simmons and guard Hubert Davis.

Stackhouse, a two-time All-Star, shed his selfish image and became more of a team player last season.

Detroit won 50 games — 18 more than the previous year — despite predictions the Pistons would finish near the bottom of the Eastern Conference.

The trade is a surprise ending to Jordan's overhaul of the Wizards starting lineup as he prepares for his final season. Washington will open the season with five new starters.

BirdHouse Acoustic Concert Series kicks off season with husband, wife musical duo

By Mike Postiglione
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After playing more than 2,000 shows in the past nine years, the renowned folk duo Small Potatoes will bring their act back to the Little Apple on Friday.

The show will take place at the Manhattan Arts Center and will mark the beginning of this season's BirdHouse Acoustic Concert Series.

The series usually consists of eight to 10 acoustic music shows scheduled throughout the school year.

Steve Martini, BirdHouse co-founder, said concerts can range from jazz to folk to single acoustic guitar performances.

"Our performers are mainstream in the folk music scene, but you wouldn't necessarily hear them on mainstream radio," Martini said. "They are all really talented people."

Such is the case with the Chicago-based duo Small Potatoes, which consists of the husband-and-wife musical team of Jacquie Manning and Rich Prezioso.

They began performing in 1992, started touring a year later, and eventually married two years after that. And they haven't stopped since.

What makes Small Potatoes such a special band is its deep understanding of all sorts of music, said David Kameron, BirdHouse chair and one of three co-founders of the organization.

"They can do cowboy songs. They can do Celtic or early swing jazz. They can play any genre," Kameron said.

Another talent of Manning and Prezioso's is that they are both capable of playing different types of music on a number of instruments, Kameron said.

Prezioso can sing and play the guitar, mandolin, and a number of percussion instruments. Manning sings and can play the guitar, flute, tin whistle and mandolin, among other instruments.

■ Tickets
$15 for general public, $12 for students and seniors available at the Manhattan Arts Center, the Dusty Bookshelf and Clafin Books. Tickets and season tickets also available at the door, pending availability.

Prezioso offered a similar description of his band's style.

"We usually call ourselves 'eclectic-tomaniacs,'" he said. "That's a good way of putting it. We write songs that I guess you could call folk, but it's a lot of different styles we actually play."

Prezioso does most of the guitar work while Manning contributes her songwriting capabilities. In 1998, Manning won the Kerrville New Folk Songwriting Contest, the only songwriting contest she ever entered, Prezioso said.

The two have performed at several festivals, including the Kerrville Folk Festival in Kerrville, Texas, for the past three years.

They've also played at the Walnut Valley Festival in Winfield, Kan., the past five years. This festival, at the Cowley County Fairgrounds, usually brings in a total of 20,000 people every year.

The popularity of Small Potatoes has blossomed not only because of talented vocals and musical chemistry, but also because of a dedicated and outspoken fan base, Kameron said.

"I've known about them for five or six years," he said. "Patrons of ours would come up to us and say, 'You've got to get Small Potatoes. They're so fun.' And when we had them originally, they were a huge hit. So we knew we wanted to invite them back."

"There's simply been a demand by our patrons," Kameron said. "They tend to have pretty good knowledge about music, and they let us know about the music that they love."

IN BRIEF

Entertainment industry groups have asked a federal court judge to rule before a trial on their copyright infringement claims against Internet file-swapping services KaZaA, Grokster and Morpheus.

Attorneys for StreamCast Networks, which distributes the peer-to-peer software program Morpheus, also have asked the judge to rule that distribution of the software doesn't violate copyright law.

The Recording Industry Association of America, Motion Picture Association of America and National Music Publishers' Association asked a U.S. District Court judge Monday to issue a summary judgment in their favor.

The groups argued that evidence gathered in the past several months makes it "abundantly clear" that the file-swapping services are illegal.

Briefs from both sides were filed under seal at the request of the defendants, who have claimed issues of confidentiality.

In a statement, the three plaintiffs claim the Internet services patterned themselves after the file-swapping company Napster and built their services into a "candy store of infringement" that allows users to find music and movies online without paying the copyright holders.

Area bands compete in 16th annual Opus competition today

Nine musical groups have chance to win money, exposure, bragging rights at K-State Student Union today

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nine area bands will play for bragging rights and some cash today in the 16th annual Opus band competition.

Opus will take place from 5 to 11 tonight in the K-State Student Union Plaza. In the case of rain, the event will be moved to the Union Ballroom on the second floor of the Union.

Sarah Montgomery, department chair for UPC Arts and Entertainment, said that after listening to the nine bands' demo tapes she expects the competition to be tight.

Montgomery said this year's Opus should benefit from recent developments in the local music scene.

"All of Manhattan seems to be interested in local bands right now," Montgomery said.

Each band will have 20 minutes to play in front of the audience and a panel of judges. The judges will rate the bands on the originality of music, vocal ability, instrumental ability, stage presence, and delivery and audience appeal.

The panel will be made up of staff members from KSDB-FM 91.9 and the Collegian, as well as an audience member chosen at random.

The top three bands will be rewarded with a check from UPC in the amounts of $400 for first place, $250 for second place, and $150 for third place. The prize money is generated from a $40 entry fee from all of the bands.

Montgomery said Opus gives bands an opportunity to gain experience and exposure. Some of the region's most successful acts, such as Truck Stop Love, Vitreous Humor, Ruskabank, Pomeroy and Ultimate Fake Book all played Opus early in their careers.

Big names and big money might be intimidating for some bands, but Matt Frost, guitarist and vocalist for Black Box Within, said his band is going to try and treat its performance like any other.

Frost said focusing on the competitive aspect or the prizes would burden the band.

"We just want a chance for some of our friends and family to see us play," he said.

"If we win, we win, and if we don't, we'll still have fun."

Kyle Babson, bassist for the Lawrence band, Key, said they decided to re-enter the competition after an enjoyable experience last year, when Key took third place.

Babson said the previous competition attracted a number of quality bands and his band was pleased to have placed.

Babson said the limited time of competitive sets forced the band to play its music with a different emphasis.

"You don't have a lot of time to build a relationship with the audience, so it's more about playing your songs as precisely as possible," Babson said.

Ryan Hurley, rhythm guitarist and vocalist for Scholar, said the big draw for him was the opportunity to play on campus, but there were other motivating factors.

"It doesn't hurt that they give you a couple bucks if people seem to like you," he said. "We started a band bank account and it could use a little help if we get some money, or maybe we'll just throw a big pizza party."

payment. We're just trying to figure out what amount is correct."

Hayden said that City Manager Ron Fehr will be meeting with golf course representatives next week to discuss the total costs. The amount Colbert Hills owes is not yet agreed upon.

"They wanted to verify numbers. I don't blame them," he said. "I have confidence the numbers are correct."

Hayden said he also has led a task force to establish measures that would ensure better accountability in the production, distribution and measurement of the final consumption of city water.

Hayden said the city wants to ensure the Manhattan business district and residents the problem won't happen again.

"We have a fairly good relationship among the community to both residential and commercial users," he said. "It is a partnership."

SLEEP | Experts recommend short power naps to refresh students

you give up sleep for a lot of things," he said.

"Stress is a big factor to getting to sleep. If I have a lot on my mind, I have trouble going to sleep," he said.

Although some students find it hard to concentrate on sleep during an academic overload, others find it harder to rest when there are a variety of activities going on.

"It can be hard to go to sleep because there's so much to do," Jessica Barnes, junior in English, said. "In the dorms there's always something going on."

Justin Claybrook, junior in architectural engineering, felt that getting sleep in college is harder because of the atmosphere.

"It's more relaxed and there's more stuff to do," he said. "With all of these people around, there's no reason to sleep."

Fighting the bug

While homework is important and parties might seem high on the priority list, Rathbun said the lack of sleep can lead to serious side effects.

"Traditionally, students are still growing and need more sleep," he said. "If you have sleep deprivation, you lower your mental capacity."

"If you get an adequate amount of sleep, the energy rises, and you're mentally sharper and less likely to get illnesses associated with the immune systems."

Not only does sleep deprivation increase the risk of immunological diseases, it also affects human emotions.

In a February 2002 study, the National Sleep Foundation found that people who slept less than six hours were more likely to say they were tired, stressed, sad and angry than those who slept more than eight hours each night.

"When I get enough sleep, I feel good the next day," Barnes said. "And class doesn't seem quite so horrible."

Cat naps

For some students, the so-called 'power' naps can work wonders — if done correctly.

At Flinders University in Adelaide, Australia, associate professor Leon Lack and postgraduate student Amber Tietzel concluded that 10 minutes is best for a nap, because it improves performance for up to three hours afterward.

However, Rathbun disagreed, saying that 10-minute naps were too short.

"A 15-minute power nap is a good thing," he said.

"If you go beyond 15 minutes, it disrupts the sleep pattern and makes it harder to sleep at night."

Moreover, short naps help students catch up on sleep they might have missed throughout the night, Rathbun said.

"I take a nap about once a week," Barnes said. "I just get behind in sleep, so I find them helpful."

Sleeping like a baby

Although college students live a hectic life, Rathbun said there are ways to get the adequate amount of sleep each night.

"It's usually best to go to bed at the same hour every night and to get up at the same time each morning, with adjustments on the weekends," he said.

"College students find this difficult because of their different schedules each day."

Moreover, Rathbun said, students should prepare themselves before going to bed each night.

"Find something more relaxing to do 30 minutes before going to bed," he said.

"Get into the process of sleep. Don't exercise or take showers before sleeping because this builds stimulation. If you want to bathe yourself before going to bed, take a bath."

All in all, Rathbun advises students to take sleep seriously and to enjoy the benefits.

"You feel so energized, and you perform better when you get an adequate amount of sleep," he said.

"For the long haul, it's just better for you."

Royals, Chiefs up to no good in Kansas City

to the Kansas City Star, two unidentified Royals players said Neifi Perez refused to enter Monday night's game after Manager Tony Peña pinch-hit for Angel Berroa in the eighth inning. Perez said later in the week that he was just joking around — I don't buy his story.

The shortstop should be cut immediately. The Royals should not try to re-sign him during the off-season, and any undermining of Peña is a very bad thing.

Well, hopefully your weekend won't be as random as this column. Have a good one.

BUSH | U.S. officials not expecting Hussein to change

that has lost its legitimacy will also lose its power."

Bush gave Hussein a chance to avoid confrontation, but only if Iraq meets a series of strict U.S. demands that no U.S. official, including Bush, expects Iraq to meet. The biggest challenge to Hussein: Remove or destroy all weapons of mass destruction from Iraqi soil.

The address was Bush's answer to deep reluctance among U.S. allies — and American lawmakers — to use force against Hussein despite Iraq's decade-old defiance of U.N. resolutions. By coming to the U.N., Bush rejected the advice of some senior administration officials who had urged him to confront Iraq alone and without delay.

Defiant as ever, Iraq's U.N. Ambassador Mohammed Al-Douri blasted Bush.

"He chooses to deceive the world and his own people by the longest series of fabrications that have ever been told by a leader of a nation," Al-Douri said.

Bush did not spell out the consequences of Hussein's refusal to comply, but senior administration officials pointed to language in the address that points to the potential for military action: "The purpose of the United States should not be doubted: The Security Council resolutions will be enforced."

Bush wins test vote on Homeland Security

By Curt Anderson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush won an important homeland security test vote Thursday when the Senate signaled its unwillingness to set up a powerful new anti-terrorism office that the White House opposes.

By a 55-41 vote, the Senate effectively endorsed Bush's position against the office, which would be subject to Senate confirmation and have broad budgetary powers. The office was included in the Democratic version of the bill setting up a new Homeland Security Department, but Bush sees it as an unwarranted congressional intrusion.

Although a final vote was put off on an amendment removing the office entirely from the bill, 48 Republicans joined six Democrats and independent, Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont, in siding with the president on the vote.

"It's clear from the vote we have just taken that a majority of the Senate feels it goes too far," said Sen. Bob Graham, D-Fla., of the proposed office.

Less certain was whether that coalition would hold on the other main controversy in the debate over the new department: whether the president would have greater powers to hire and fire, or exempt from union coverage, the proposed agency's 170,000 workers. But Republicans said the vote on the anti-terrorism office showed that Bush has the upper hand in the creation of an agency intended to protect Americans from terrorism at home.

"We ought to give the president the benefit of the doubt," said Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn.

The homeland security office occupied by Tom Ridge was created by Bush last year via executive order. The White House strongly resisted congressional efforts to force Ridge to testify on Capitol Hill, and Bush has made it clear he wants to keep Ridge's counsel about potential threats and U.S. intelligence confidential.

"He's entitled to have his own counsel with regard to this," Thompson said.

Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., chief sponsor of the Democratic bill, attempted to offer a compromise on the anti-terrorism office but he was blocked by a fellow Democrat, Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia, who threatened a filibuster. Byrd favors greater congressional involvement in homeland security.

"I am in favor of creating a Department of Homeland Security. But I am not in favor of Congress doing that and then walking away," Byrd said. With that latest delay, it appeared likely that most action on the homeland security bill would be put off until next week. Earlier Thursday, House Republicans heaped scorn on Senate Democrats for the slow pace, noting that the House passed its bill in July.

"There's no excuse for not giving the people of this country a homeland security bill," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said the more careful Senate debate would produce "a much better bill" than the House version.

Despite the differences, the House and Senate bills both give Bush much of what he wants in a new Homeland Security Department, including transfer of more than 22 agencies such as the Coast Guard, Border Patrol, Transportation Security Administration, Customs Service and Secret Service.

KEMP | Fund-raising efforts garnering wide support

Other fund-raising activities will include an event around Kemp's birthday, Oct. 11, and a philanthropy with Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity at KU, where Kemp's boyfriend, Phil Howes, is a member.

"It will be something really cool for everyone to get involved in," Lindsay Courtney, sophomore in mass communications, said.

In addition to raising funds, the Pi Phi members are assisting in the search for Kemp's killer.

"We put up the pictures of the suspect at bars and gas stations," O'Brien said. "They don't know where he is, but I hope they find him soon."

The Pi Phi members also spoke with greek houses to get the word out, Erin Richardson, sophomore in education, said.

"About 20 girls were assigned different fraternities and sororities," Richardson said.

"We went and spoke about the situation and gave each house the composite picture. We told them to send it to their families."

But, with all the fund-raising and searches for the killer, Kemp's friends want to keep the focus on their friend.

"She would be overwhelmed with all the love everyone has poured out for her," she said.

"She would be amazed how many people did care about her."

DRINKING GAMES

Some party-goers supplement drinking with a variety of games. However, like any game, there must be rules. To help you out, the Collegian editors have compiled a list of our favorite games to liven up your party.

The game: Presidents and Assholes

Number of players: As many as a deck of cards will allow

The Rules: A deck of cards is dealt to players. The three of clubs begins the game, and only cards higher in number can be played following that. Twos clear, threes reverse. If two cards of the same number are played in succession, the next player must drink and lose his or her turn.

Objective: The first to finish playing her cards is the president and is able to delegate drinks throughout the next round. The last person to finish is the asshole and may delegate drinks only while dealing the next round.

The game: High, Low, Smoke or Fire

Number of players: Two

The Rules: The dealer presents a card, and a player predicts the next card — either higher or lower in number than the first. A player might also say black (smoke) or red (fire). Wrong guesses result in the player taking a drink, and the dealer drinks on correct guesses. Continue the round through one rotation of the deck.

Objective: Since the pace is fast, drinks can add up quickly. The goal of each player is to win more rounds than his competitor.

The game: Circle of Death

Number of players: As many as possible without creating chaos

The Rules: A deck of cards is arranged in a circle. The player to the right of the dealer begins by selecting a card, and play continues in that rotation. The card values follow these general rules: evens through eight — distribute drinks among other players; odds through seven — consume the number yourself; nine — a sequence of rhymed words starting with the person who draws; 10 — make a rule; jack — truth or dare (remember, from second grade?); queen — a sequence of random questions that cannot be answered; king — everyone toasts and drinks together.

Objective: The goal is to become really inebriated and learn about other people without embarrassing yourself too much during the truth or dare rounds.

All three of these games use playing cards. Check out www.webtender.com/handbook/games for more interesting ways to spice up a drab party.

House parties provide entertaining night life, gathering place

By Kacia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women can't get into all house parties for free.

No one can if it's Ryan Lunn's house party. Lunn, junior in marketing, charges $3 to $5 for men and women to enter and drink at his parties.

"I was pretty regulatory about that," he said, "since I was the one who paid for the parties."

For Lunn, house parties are ideal times for friends to socialize. For other college students, too, parties in fraternity houses, apartments or houses on random streets provide fun going-out atmospheres.

Lunn said he had about 20-30 keg parties last year at his eight-person house with an average attendance of 40-plus. For his birthday party last year, however, he said he could not even estimate how many people were there.

To have a successful party, Lunn said, there are a few requirements.

"People, music, beer, alcohol, people who dance," he said. "Some people get drunk and decide they're going to moonwalk."

Sgt. Steve Boyda, Riley County Police Department, said neighbors usually call in 10-15 loud party complaints each weekend night.

Boyda said police officers stop at house parties if they drive by and suspect underage drinking, if there has been a noise complaint or if parties' parking is causing a problem.

Lunn said that although police have never issued him a ticket for any of these violations, officers have confronted him twice — once because they expected to find underage drinking, and another time because his guests were causing parking problems.

"All they did was ask us to move the cars," Lunn said.

Boyda said that at most parties, he and other officers will ask whoever is responsible for the party to come outside. Usually, one of the house owners will come forward. If no one claims to live there, however, Boyda said the people who are in the house technically can be charged with criminal trespassing.

When underage drinkers are present at an outdoor house party, Boyda said officers can issue tickets for minor in possession. At parties, Boyda said, he usually can pick out the inexperienced drinkers.

"Most of them will volunteer their age by dropping it or trying to hide, especially at a larger party," he said. "You can easily tell who's a minor and who's not just by the way they act."

Even if underage people are drinking on their own front porch and police suspect they are young, officers can issue MIPs, Boyda said.

Penalties for alcohol-related offenses

Fines are assessed for each infraction in addition to a court cost totalling $59.50 in Manhattan.

■ Causing or allowing loud, disturbing noise
$25 - $50 for first offense

■ Transportation of open container
$25 for first offense

■ Minor in possession
$200 for first offense

■ Driving under the influence
$500 - $1,000 for first offense

■ DUI diversion
$500 - $1,000, drug/alcohol information school also required.

■ Minor in possession diversion
$409.50

■ Unlawful use of driver's license
minimum $200, first offense

Besides police officers showing up as uninvited party guests to break up a party, Lunn said there are a few other downsides to throwing a huge bash.

"Stuff's gotten stolen. My door got kicked in by one of my friends one time," he said. "I've never made any one pay for anything that broke. I've also had 15 or 16 pint glasses stolen."

And the cleaning up can be a pain, he said, like it was after his seven-kegger last year.

"The house was completely trashed the next day," he said. "It depends on how we feel the next day if we'll clean right away."

While Lunn likes his parties big, Matt, freshman in business, said he usually knows everyone at the parties he attends. Matt said he has seen some damage after parties.

"This circle glass table — someone jumped on it and broke it, a broken door, candles thrown into the walls — this was all at the same party," he said. "People laying in their own puke passed out."

He recommends having a few necessities.

"Try to have girls, pool dancers and lap dances and body shots," he said.

Lori, sophomore in speech pathology, said she likes big parties.

"I like the parties wherever something's happening, wherever the most people are," she said.

Lori said she likes parties for meeting new people and for the free alcohol she is offered because she is a woman. She said a woman doesn't necessarily have to be beautiful for guys to let her drink for free.

"I think as long as you're a girl, it doesn't really matter," she said.

Last names of some sources have been withheld to preserve their future drinking experiences.

Sobriety checkpoints teach violators consequences of drunken driving

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One Friday night four years ago, Justin Thompson went out and had a couple of drinks.

Hours later, he got into his car and began to drive and was soon pulled over when police lights flashed in his rearview mirror.

"When I got pulled over, I wasn't too worried about it," Thompson, sophomore in business, said. "It had been a couple of hours since I had been drinking, and I thought that they had pulled me over for speeding."

However, the police made him blow into a Breathalyzer and walk a straight line, he said.

Although Thompson passed his sobriety tests, other students aren't so lucky at sobriety checkpoints at various locations in Manhattan during April through September.

Riley County Police Sgt. Steve Boyda said that a grant from the Kansas Department of Transportation funds six different sobriety checkpoints each year in the Manhattan area.

"DUI checkpoints are more to educate the public and try to deter people from drinking and driving," he said.

Police officers set up checkpoints at locations where records show high DUI rates, Boyda said. They stop each car that drives through the checkpoint, a process that takes an average of 37 seconds per stop, he said.

Once stopped, trained officers will look inside the car, speak to the driver, and if necessary, perform a sobriety test. Tests might include a one-leg stand, walking a straight line, horizontal eye gaze and breath tests.

"We only test the ones that are stopped and show indication they've consumed alcohol," he said.

If caught, age and consumption levels come into play, Boyda said.

Kansas law states that a DUI arrest is made if a driver is 21 years or older and has a blood-alcohol concentration of .08 or higher. If a driver is under 21 years old and has a blood-alcohol level from .02 to .08, a suspension of license will be issued.

According to records from the RCPD, a previous sobriety checkpoint located at 1000 N. Manhattan Ave. on Aug. 24 had a range of results.

Throughout the early morning hours, the police department stopped a total of 250 vehicles. Twenty drivers were tested, eight drivers were arrested for DUI, one drug arrest was made, and four open containers were found.

Six to 10 arrests are averaged at each checkpoint, Boyda said.

"In actuality, more DUI arrests are made while on patrol," he said.

In 1998, sobriety checkpoints throughout the state found a total of 391 impaired drivers on Kansas roads.

Thompson said he would like officers to adjust tests during a checkpoint and not "pick out" students.

"You shouldn't have to walk after you have passed your Breathalyzer test," he said. "There are other people that drink, yet they harass us."

GAMEDAY NOTES

Football tickets — Tickets are available for Saturday's home game against the Panthers. The K-State ticket office can be reached at 1-800-221-CATS.

Radio — Mid America Sports Network will be the official network carrier for K-State Athletics. The network covers 25 affiliates throughout the state of Kansas. Wyatt Thompson will be the 'Voice of the Wildcats' for 2002, with former Wildcat quarterback Stan Weber on color and Chris Allison on the sideline. Steven Weber is the producer of the Mid America Sports Network. Fans can tune in to KMKF-FM 101.5 or KMAN-AM 1350 for pre-game, game and post-game coverage of the Cats game against Eastern Illinois.

Series — This will be the first meeting on the football field between K-State and Eastern Illinois. The Panthers are the only team on the Wildcats' 2002 schedule that K-State has never faced.

Storyline — K-State will attempt to earn a 3-0 start for the 11th time in Coach Bill Snyder's 14 seasons in Manhattan when it plays host to Eastern Illinois in the Cats' first day game of the season.

The Wildcats were 2-0 a year ago, but lost to Oklahoma in their third game of the season. The only other two times K-State failed to win its first three games under Snyder were in 1989 and 1990.

The matchup continues K-State's four-game homestand against non-conference teams. The Wildcats play all four of their non-Big 12 conference games at KSU Stadium in preparation for league action in October.

Eastern Illinois started the season with a 61-36 loss at Hawaii on Aug. 31 before taking last Saturday off. The Panthers opened the year ranked fourth in the two main NCAA Division I-AA polls (The Sports Network and ESPN/USA Today) and were rated third in Sports Illustrated's preseason I-AA ranking.

EIU, which was 9-2 overall last season, including 6-0 in the OVC, has been to the Division I-AA playoffs in each of the last two seasons, losing in the first round last season to Northern Iowa.

Hawaii and K-State are the only two Division I-A schools on Eastern Illinois' schedule this season. After non-conference home games against Indiana State and Illinois State, the Panthers open defense of their Ohio Valley Conference championship at Tennessee Tech on Oct. 5.

Streaks — K-State owns a 36-game home winning streak against non-conference opponents. The last loss to a non-league foe at KSU Stadium was against Northern Illinois in 1989, when the Cats lost 37-20. Against all non-conference opponents home or away in the regular season, K-State has won 33 straight. The last loss was a 28-16 defeat at Utah State on Oct. 17, 1992.

Since 1990 — K-State is 71-3 when holding opponents to 15 points or less, 14-3 when the Cats pass for at least 300 yards and 86-6 when scoring first.

The last time — K-State last passed for 300 yards when Jonathan Beasley threw for 311 yards against Oklahoma State on Oct. 23, 1999.

The last time — The Cats last allowed a team to attempt 40 passes when Texas Tech's Kliff Kingsbury threw 47 times against K-State last season.

Cats prepare to take on best offense yet; Eastern Illinois presents new challenge

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coaches and players don't want K-State's game with Eastern Illinois billed as a tune-up for the Cats' matchup with Southern California.

If they buy into that, they could be in for a rude awakening, Coach Bill Snyder said.

EIU should be the best offensive team K-State has faced thus far, he said. Because of that, K-State is preparing accordingly.

"Their offense is a little like what we played against last week," Snyder said. "They're a formation offense. They try to get you in a position where you might get out of your responsibilities because you aren't making the right decisions."

If the result is the same as last week, the Panthers could be in for a long game.

But Snyder said he is convinced that probably won't happen. Not that he wouldn't like it to, but, he said, Eastern Illinois brings a few more things to the table than the Cats' previous two opponents.

"They're primarily a one-back offense," Snyder said. "They can play with two tight ends, or have one tight end and three receivers. There are just so many things they can do with their formations."

Those formations revolve around one center-piece — quarterback Tony Romo.

Romo threw for 319 yards against Hawaii on Aug. 31. The Panther offense scored 36 points on the Rainbows, but the EIU defense gave up 61, in a week-one loss.

"That quarterback is really something," Defensive Coordinator Bob Elliott said. "He's not a scrambler that can run with the ball — he's a scrambler that can throw the ball," Elliott said.

Panthers present little to counter K-State attack on gridiron, in print

Eastern Illinois backers support good sportsmanship, no need for trash talk

This last week has been a desperate search.

No it wasn't for my car keys, nor a parking place within five blocks of campus.

And it wasn't even for someone who could have predicted the ending of the Chiefs-Browns game.

It was for something much rarer.

Trash talk from Eastern Illinois.

After scouring Internet sites that ranged from the Charleston County Daily Times-Courier to the student newspaper at Eastern Illinois, not a single soul said a discouraging thing about K-State.

Defensive Coordinator Roc Bellantoni said, "They're way better than Hawaii." He also gave compliments to our line-men and said the game should be a "good measuring stick for us."

CHRIS SHANK

Thanks a lot Roc. This just makes my job that much harder.

I need bulletin board material to rant and rave about, and the first three opponents haven't given me anything.

So I turned to the traditional hotbed of school loyalty and optimism, the school newspaper. The Daily Eastern News, as it's known, had more stories devoted to the women's JV soccer team than football.

So I went out on a limb and came to the conclusion that football is not a way of life at Eastern Illinois.

Even its columnists were more concerned about how the Chicago Bears were looking than its very own Panthers. So it would not be a stretch to say that Charleston, Ill., is not gripped with Panther Football Fever.

So with no ammunition to fire, let's take a look at the Panthers.

For the second time this year, a ranked opponent enters Manhattan. Eastern Illinois is No. 8 in one poll and No. 9 in the ESPN/USA Today Poll for Division I-AA programs.

You might scoff and repeat the tired old national media line of "why can't we schedule more D-1 teams," but before you start sounding like Terry Bowden, remember that Eastern Illinois is probably the best team we've faced all year long.

Besides, they probably could hang 40 on KU.

Even Coach Snyder agrees. "Obviously they're a good football team or they wouldn't be ranked in the top 10 last year and again this year," he said. "They get good personnel there. It'll be the best football team we've played up to this point in time."

Last week, I gave you five

Offense

8 — Taco Wallace, wide receiver	8 — Nick Allison, cornerback
65 — Thomas Barnett, left tackle	96 — Kory Lothe, defensive end
60 — Mike Johnson, right guard	46 — Alex Schmink, defensive end
75 — Dralinn Burks, right tackle	36 — Roosevelt Williams, cornerback
88 — Thomas Hill, tight end	99 — Lance Thompson, outside linebacker
15 — Davin Dennis, wide receiver	55 — David Bentley, middle linebacker
5 — Marc Dunn, quarterback	2 — Nick Ricks, outside linebacker
44 — Travis Wilson, fullback	24 — Kevin Anderson, free safety
43 — Darren Sproles, running back	6 — Fred Miller, strong safety

Collegian Insight:
K-State threw the ball more effectively last week. Look for Dunn to open it up against a defense that gave up 453 passing yards to Hawaii. EIU's defense has just one sack and one interception on the year.

Defense

98 — Andrew Shull, left end	88 — Nick Eller, tight end
30 — Tank Reese, defensive tackle	56 — Frank Castagnoli, right tackle
62 — Corey White, nose tackle	67 — Chris Rosenlund, right guard
90 — Henry Bryant, right end	64 — Scott Sholl, center
4 — Terence Newman, cornerback	76 — Kevin Hill, left guard
9 — Randy Jordan, cornerback	77 — Mike Bujnak, left tackle
18 — Bryan Hickman, linebacker	9 — Devon O'Neal, flanker
56 — Terry Pierce, linebacker	80 — Will Bumphus, split end
7 — Josh Buhl, linebacker	17 — Tony Romo, quarterback
1 — Bobby Walker, free safety	48 — Andre Jones, fullback
2 — Rashad Washington, strong safety	22 — J.R. Taylor, tailback

Collegian Insight:
This will be the best offense the Cats have seen yet this season. Quarterback Tony Romo threw for four TDs against Hawaii. Also, EIU likes to spread the wealth. Romo's 30 completions have gone to seven different receivers.

Cats' nationally ranked defense gunning for 2nd shutout Saturday

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On Aug. 31, Texas cruised to a 27-point victory, shutting out the North Texas Mean Green.

It was the Longhorns' first and only game so far this season, and it earned them the nation's highest-rated scoring defense.

K-State, after two games and three points given up, ranks 1.5 points behind in second place.

How does a team that has only given up three points improve from week to week?

Just try to not mess anything up, Coach Bill Snyder said.

"The most important thing is that if we improve in certain areas, which we did, that we don't try to stop improving in these areas," he said.

But upstaging the defensive precedence established against Louisiana-Monroe might be tough for a Wildcat squad still attempting to incorporate inexperienced players.

Not to mention the Eastern Illinois Panthers promise to offer their own brand of trouble in standout quarterback Tony Romo.

Two weeks ago, the Panthers scored 36 points on Hawaii. Romo completed 30-of-53 pass attempts, for four touchdowns and 319 yards.

"They spread all out over the field, and they have good receivers and a great quarterback," Defensive Coordinator Bob Elliott said. "He could play at any Division-I school in the country. I think he's really that good."

Eastern Illinois presents an offense similar to Louisiana-Monroe's. Both schools specialize in shifting between different formations, hoping to catch the defense in a compromising lineup.

But ULM had no such luck. The Indians were held to only 160 yards and zero points.

In order for the Cats to slow Romo and the shifty Panthers, the defensive linemen will have to be able to put significant pressure on the quarterback, and hope the Cats' inexperienced secondary allows them time to make the hit.

So far this season, the Cats have recorded four sacks. Junior defensive end Andrew Shull is responsible for two of those and hopes to add more to his tally this weekend.

"They are a great offensive group. They throw the ball a lot, and they have a lot of different formations to adjust to," Shull said. "We are just going to try and put some pressure on him and try and put some guys on their backs."

But Romo is notorious for being able to avoid the rush and still complete the play. It will take careful attention to holes and gaps for the Wildcats to put a clamp on the Panthers, Elliott said.

"We have to rush him, but we have to rush him with discipline so he doesn't step around into holes and throw the ball," Elliott said. "Of course we have to cover. They find holes and creases in defenses."

The Cats also hope to tire Eastern Illinois with depth at key positions, Elliott said. Four K-State defensive ends will rotate during the game.

"We got four ends that can alternate," he said. "If they throw the ball a lot, the fact that we can keep fresh troops in the field to rush the passer becomes pretty important."

Even though No. 16 USC awaits on Sept. 21, you won't find any of the Cats overlooking Saturday's game.

"We can't skip any steps," Shull said. "We have to start concentrating on parts of the defense and try and get those little parts better. Because if we miss anything, we're not going to be ready."

Coaches content with early wins; offense seeks more improvement

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two games, 498 yards rushing, 394 yards passing and 14 touchdowns has equaled two very, very lopsided victories.

As the Wildcats head into their third game against Eastern Illinois, the offense is getting things finished.

But the true strength of the 2002 Wildcat offense is still a question mark.

Coach Bill Snyder said his own questions concerning the offense are no different than any other area of his football team: The Wildcats are looking to become a deeper, more competitive group.

"We're trying to get better individually, trying to get better collectively in certain aspects of the game — whether it's in the passing game or the running game," Snyder said. "I have no earthly idea why anybody would practice if it wasn't for that purpose, and that's what our deal is."

Saturday's contest versus the Panthers will mark K-State's second game against a Division I-AA program, an opportunity to improve that Snyder said his team should use to its advantage.

"You hear me talk about improvement all the time," he said. "You'll hear our players talk about improvement all the time. In all honesty, no matter who you talk to, in any program in the country, that's probably what you'll hear them talk about."

"It's a matter of really believing it, of believing it's not just a matter of going out and preparing for the next ball game. It's a matter of doing all the things you have to do on and off the field to get yourself to become a better player."

Snyder said this emphasis carries weight no matter who you see lined up on the other side of the ball.

"If you're focused on that, then it's not so much who the other team is or what the other team does as much as it is who we are and what we do. That's where we are in terms of our philosophical approach to our non-conference schedule and pre-conference games," he said.

Part of getting better offensively means having a quarterback who understands the necessity of proper preparation.

Receiving corps impresses Snyder

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Take a look at the receiving effort in last Saturday's 68-0 shellacking of Louisiana-Monroe, and you're probably going to come up with some stuff for the highlight reel.

James Terry opened the scoring attack with a 17-yard touchdown reception, punctuated by a fully extended end-over-end flip into the endzone.

Five minutes later, Marc Dunn connected with Terence

Newman for a 51-yard strike that saw Newman five steps in front of his defender by the time the ball reached him two yards deep in the endzone.

Taco Wallace laid out for an over-the-shoulder touchdown grab in the first half, and Junior Derrick Evans had three receptions for 47 yards.

One might say the performance of the Wildcats' new batch of wide outs was encouraging.

Coach Bill Snyder thought so, too, to a point.

"In a meeting yesterday, I told our wide receivers and our team that I was really proud of the performance of our wide receivers," Snyder said. "I said that a week ago, I was concerned about how far we were getting along."

"But after Saturday's game I thought, 'you know, we're making some progress here. I really like what you guys are doing, and I'm proud of you,' — and they practiced last night like

Shull making early impression

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's the dedication to the small things and a good, hard work ethic that makes junior defensive end Andrew Shull so good, coaches say.

That, and enough speed to blow around an offensive line and pancake enemy signal callers before they know what hits them.

"He's a guy who has got real good movement. He's fast," Defensive Coordinator Bob Elliott said. "He's a smart player, he works at it, and he works at all the things you have to do to be good."

Only two games into the 2002 season, Shull hasn't even had much time to impress Elliott.

Nevertheless, since Elliott came to Manhattan last spring, Shull has been able to do just that.

He has improved his play, fine-tuned his skills and made a monster impression on the new coach.

"He's been good since I've been here, but he has gotten better," Elliott said. "He's one of those guys who can be as good as he wants to be. I don't think there's any limits on how good he could be. I really like him."

Shull dedicated himself to improving after last season.

He credits his passion and intensity for the game as reasons for his improvement. The coaches, on the other hand, Terence Newman returns a punt 40 yards for a touchdown in the first quarter of Saturday's game against Louisiana-Monroe.

Kicking game remains concern; Newman leading return teams

Collapsing lines, interrupted tempo produce mistakes

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

"I'm not real happy with it. There will be some changes made."

Coach Bill Snyder said he was frustrated with his special teams unit after the Cats' 68-0 win over Louisiana-Monroe.

Of course, he was unhappy with just one aspect of the special team's game — kicking.

Terence Newman returned a punt 40 yards for a touchdown, and punters Travis Brown and Rick Gerla combined to average 46 yards per punt.

But kicker Joe Rheem had two extra points blocked in Saturday's game, resurrecting flashes of last season.

That prompted Snyder to address that aspect afterward.

"We have to be able to kick the ball better," he said. "We got some blocked, but some of that stems from the execution of the snapper, holder and kicker."

"And outside of that, someone's going to get fired."

So there might be some changes on this weekend's starting kicking unit.

But those alterations won't consist of changes to K-State's core kicking unit.

"What happened was they got knocked back far enough to where they were into us," kicker Joe Rheem said. "People just weren't getting the right guys, so that needs to improve."

Linemen got pushed into Rheem's comfort zone, causing him to lose his focus, he said.

But that's not to say it is all their fault, he said.

He still has room for improvement as well.

"I'm just working on getting my ball a little higher," Rheem said. "It's all a matter of tempo, and we have to get better at that."

Rheem said tempo consists of a good snap, an even better hold and finally a perfect kick.

But if one of the first two fails, the kick could get blocked, Rheem said.

"You try not to think about those things because it's all mental," Rheem said. "It does matter, but at the same time, I have to be concerned with what I am doing and not worry about what else is happening."

At the same time, it's hard to focus when the line is collapsing or a snap is not crisp, kicker Jared Brite said.

"When you see that snap wobbling or having troubles, it takes away from your focus," Brite said.

"We've worked on that a lot, and we hope to see the necessary improvements."

Those improvements not only have to be made by kickers, holders and snappers, Snyder said, but by coaches as well, he said.

Coaches need betterment because they are the ones who can see those mistakes at a more evaluative angle.

"As we look at it from a personal standpoint, there will be," Snyder said. "At the same time, we have to make positions better and perhaps we can do it by changing people, but we have to do a better job of preparing. We have to coach them better."

Improvements have definitely been made in the punt returning game, Snyder said.

The Cats have returned six punts for a total of 88 yards, nearly 15 yards per punt.

Most of the damage has been done by Newman, who already has racked up 42 yards on punts.

Snyder said Newman might be one of the most versatile players he has coached in a long time.

"I mean this sincerely — there are 11 spots (on special teams), and he can play every one of them," he said.

OFFENSE | Quarterback's confidence level rising; offense making significant strides toward consistency

knowing he is going to achieve plays an important role in that preparation, no matter the opponent.

"The game of football is confidence," Dunn said.

"The more confidence you have, the better you're going to play."

Perhaps one reason for confidence might be Dunn's newest weapon: defensive back/punt return specialist/wide receiver Terence Newman.

"From a defensive standpoint, you have to be aware of where he is all the time. Does that help you offensively? Yes. He's an asset whether you go to him or not," Snyder said.

It would appear, based on stats and an upgraded offensive arsenal, that the Wildcats are ready to roll.

Snyder said time will prove that assumption to be true or false.

"I'm not as comfortable as I'd like to be," he said. "We need a couple of young guys to step up right now," he said. "We got, perhaps, a little closer this last week. It helped us clear the air a little bit but we're not where we need to be."

WIDE OUTS | Big plays, athletic maneuvering characterize receivers' performances in 1st 2 contests

they had just graduated from third grade. So we'll see where it goes from here. I have no clue. 'Can't stand prosperity' is the name of the game."

Offensive Coordinator Ron Hudson said there are certainly things to be wary of when you look at the wide out effort against Louisiana-Monroe.

"The biggest thing is the talent level we're going to see later on in the Big 12," Hudson said.

"We have to be sensitive to the fact that the people we are going to play in the future are going to present more of a problem based simply on talent and speed."

But Hudson also said there were reasons for optimism in the passing game success against the Indians.

"To be honest, we were very surprised we played as well as we did last Saturday night," Hudson said.

"If you look at that team we played the other night midway through the second quarter against Mississippi, they're leading three nothing, against Eli Manning."

Receivers coach Greg Peterson said he was pleased with Saturday's effort but added that there is indeed room for his wide outs to grow within K-State's program.

"I think we're on our way," he said.

"One thing we have to do, something I ask these kids to do every day, is give a great effort. If we play hard every snap, we've got a chance to be pretty decent outside."

"That's something as a young group of receivers we're still working towards."

Peterson said the maturation process is something that comes with preparation and attention to progress.

"Each week, we've tried to take a couple of steps," he said. "We took some steps against Western Kentucky and I think we took a couple more against Louisiana-Monroe, and we need to take two or three more."

"Hopefully we'll just continue to get better and better each week."

Evans said he believes turning potential into on-field reality is something he and the other receivers are both capable of and striving for.

"There's a willingness to go out there and catch the ball," he said.

"We played with great receivers last year, and with the loss of those receivers, we just want to go out and prove ourselves."

SHULL | Defensive end showing improvements

feel all that was lacking from natural talent was consistency.

"He's become more consistent," Elliott said. "He's always been talented, but now he's more consistent. I think that's the next step from a talented player to a great player — consistency and focus."

The coaches aren't the only ones taking note. Shull has shown it on the field too. Each year in the Wildcat system, he has registered more tackles than he did the season before.

Last season, he racked up 30 stops, including five for a loss, and one sack. This season, he already has eight tackles and a sack in each of the Cats' first two games.

Shull started six games in that 2001 campaign while splitting time with senior Melvin Williams. This season, though, he was able to lock up a starting spot at the competitive defensive end position.

But it hasn't gone to his head. Shull says he still concentrates on what got him there and welcomes the added depth.

"The defensive ends are a different kind of group," Shull said. "We don't have ones and twos — we have four number ones. Any of the four of us could be starters."

Coming off two consecutive games with a sack, Shull said he might have his best opportunity to shine in this weekend's matchup with pass-happy Eastern Illinois.

Led by quarterback Tony Romo, Eastern Illinois totaled 319 yards passing versus Hawaii last week.

A quarterback unafraid to throw is just what Shull has been waiting for.

"Pass rush wise, we haven't really had an opportunity as much as we would have liked the last couple of games," Shull said. "We are just going to try and put some pressure on him and try and put some guys on their backs."

Whether he is able to come up big on Saturday, Shull is happy just having the opportunity to become part of K-State's defense and play the game he loves.

"I have fun all the time," Shull said.

"I just want to be one of those defensive ends that's a playmaker. One of those guys that steps on the field and you know is going to make plays."

"I am just looking to contribute something to the Lynch Mob."

Because we are facing our toughest competition yet, I will share the five things I am looking forward to seeing this week.

Cheap shots

Two weeks ago in their debut, EIU right tackle Frank Castagnoli chop blocked Hawaii defensive tackle Lui Fuga. Fuga received such a serious injury he probably will be out for a couple of months.

June Jones, Hawaii coach, said to the Honolulu papers, "That play was probably the cheapest play I ever saw anyone make. If that happened in the NFL, the guy would be fined $50,000 or $100,000. It was a flagrant play." If Castagnoli knows what is good for him, he won't try any Oakland Raider-like cheap shots against the offensive line.

Rankings

We are ranked No. 1 in something besides my mind, and that's in points on the scoreboard.

K-State is leading the nation in scoring — that's something the pollsters can't take away. Granted, the polls don't really play any role in the early part of the season, but it's aggravating to see "powerhouse" NC State ranked above K-State.

In last week's polls, the Cats moved within inches of being ranked in both the AP and ESPN/USA Today. After this weekend's thrashing of EIU, K-State should be ranked going into the USC game.

'Romo Cop' short circuits

The Panthers have only one game under their belt, their trip way out west to do battle with pass-happy Hawaii. Their quarterback, senior Tony Romo, did end up throwing for more than 300 yards in the loss, but remember that was against a Western Athletic Conference team.

Any team playing under the lights at the Rec Complex here in Manhattan could pick apart that defense. In their loss to Hawaii, Romo had 53 passing attempts.

That's probably more attempts than Nebraska will take this entire season. This week, the Cats' secondary will get an opportunity to defend the pass.

Point explosion

Last week, the Cats created big plays in every dimension of the game offensively, defensively and on special teams. Expect this week to be no different. K-State is No. 1 in scoring offense with an average of 58 points per game. If the Cats can come out of the gate early like they did in the first half last week, Eastern Illinois can expect an even longer ride home from Manhattan than Honolulu.

Last but not least, here's what K-State fans should really look forward to.

Willie's workout

Willie better have been eating his Wheaties this week. In the first two games of the season, our very own Willie the Wildcat has gotten quite a workout with push-ups.

Saturday will be the same. It is always rumored that in blowout games, a backup Willie has to relieve the big cat during the second half. The same is true for our players. The hard-working and deserving second and third teamers should get some more playing time again this weekend.

So, to the Panthers of Eastern Illinois, I'll go ahead and apologize up front for the mauling you'll endure at Wagners Field on Saturday.

Even though no one seems to think Eastern Illinois has a snowball's chance in Yuma, it doesn't matter. Our players will be fired up and ready to roll.

This is more than just a desire to beat Eastern Illinois — it is the desire to keep those guys off the scoreboard and stay undefeated.

Well, enjoy Band Day and enjoy the fireworks the Cats will show on the field tomorrow. And give me a holler if you find an enthusiastic and optimistic Eastern Illinois football fan.

EIU | Cat defense ready for challenge against potent Panther offense

"That's what makes him dangerous."

"This will be a fun one for fans to watch — not fun for me to watch, but fun for everyone else."

And Eastern Illinois provided plenty of excitement in its contest with Hawaii.

Aside from the offensive explosion from Romo, the Panther defense held the Rainbows in check long enough to make them sweat.

Snyder said that shows him what this team can do.

"In that game, it's 13-10 Eastern Illinois, but Hawaii gets an interception and a punt return for a touchdown," Snyder said. "That kind of set the tone for the rest of the game. The point I want to make is they are capable, and they can do some things if you aren't ready."

But this weekend's game will be K-State's second Division I-AA opponent this season. Two weeks ago, the Cats played Western Kentucky, which was then ranked 18th in a I-AA poll.

Eastern Illinois is ranked 8th in I-AA polls this week and poses more of a threat for K-State than Louisiana-Monroe, a Division-I opponent did last week.

"There are good players everywhere," Snyder said. "I would have said 'Here is a Louisiana-Monroe team, a I-A school, played well against Mississippi,' and my anticipation was that they would be better than I-AA Western Kentucky."

"But the score wouldn't indicate that."

K-State's defense, maybe more than anyone else, is ready for a challenge.

Neither Western Kentucky, nor Louisiana-Monroe gave the Cat tacklers much to worry about.

Still, the defense is confident another shutout is possible on Saturday.

"You can't ever be complacent," linebacker Terry Pierce said.

"There are so many better offenses we are going to play — the USC games, the Texas games, the teams with much better offenses, so there's no way we can be complacent."

Complacency is something that can't happen in any aspect of the Cats' system, Snyder said.

If it does, he said he will be in the same situation he was 13 seasons ago.

"I can remember playing a I-AA team from Northern Iowa in the first year I was here and having to explain afterwards why we lost to them," Snyder said. "It can happen. You can get yourself embarrassed in so many ways no matter who you play."

"Well-prepared football teams can provide problems for any football team. That's my insight to it. And if you really focus on that, it doesn't matter who the other team is and what they do — it comes down to who we are and what we can do."

Tax error hurting residents

Costly mistake results in major budget cuts

By Frank Flaton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

An errant keystroke at the Riley County Appraiser's office resulted in a $200 million budget shortfall and has forced county and city commissioners to scrounge for possible solutions.

Those solutions, though, won't come without a pinch on taxpayers' wallets and cuts on city departments and programs.

"It certainly was a trying time," City Manager Ron Fehr said. "I knew the impact was going to be huge. I just started to immediately think how we could correct this. Fortunately, everyone jumped on board and cooperated."

In August, the appraiser's office announced that an employee had reported the value of a $59,500 house on Pomeroy Street as $200,059,000. The city's and county's total budgets included that number, so departments had to rework their budgets to include the new total assessed value of the county.

"It was an error that should never have happened," City Commissioner Brad Everett said. "It's not acceptable. Before the error, the community thought it was going to have these funds. All the departments were then told that what

Bush says arrests show gain in war against terrorism

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bush administration Saturday hailed anti-terrorism arrests from suburban Buffalo, N.Y., to Karachi, Pakistan, and promised to tighten the noose on al-Qaeda and the terrorism cells it supports.

The capture in Pakistan of a suspected Sept. 11 operative, Ramzi Binalshibh, demonstrated that "We are relentless, we are strong, and we're not going to stop," President Bush said at Camp David, Md.

"One by one we're hunting the killers down," he said.

Shortly afterward, five Americans of Yemeni descent made initial appearances in federal court in Buffalo on charges of providing material support and resources to a foreign terrorist organization by attending an al-Qaeda-run training camp in Afghanistan in spring 2001.

"We do not fully know the intentions of those who were charged today, and our investigation is continuing," FBI Director Robert Mueller said, adding that authorities were not aware of plans for an imminent attack.

Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson said the

Mathematics takes cake at Opus competition

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

The Mathematics' frontman's gaudy blue faux fur vest turned almost as many people's heads as the band's opening number, a rocked-out guitar-driven cover of "Sweet Transvestite."

"The vest was a Christmas present from my brother a long time ago," Duke Fang, Mathematics guitarist and vocalist, said. "It was actually used in an off-Broadway play that preceded 'Hair,' about hippies and stuff. But after 'Hair' came out, and the play went under."

The Mathematics claimed the $400 first-place prize at the 16th-annual Opus band competition Friday. The win prompted a question: Why had hardly anyone seen or heard of this Manhattan band before?

"It seems like for whatever reason our stage appearance and sound aren't very well accepted in Manhattan," vocalist and guitarist Brian McCallum, graduate student in art said.

"We've been playing at the Replay in Lawrence and other out-of-town venues. It isn't because we don't want to play in Manhattan. We just can't seem to get a gig here to save our lives."

Placing second in the competition and winning $250 was The Black Box Within, followed by young newcomers Addictive Behavior in third, who won $150.

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Financial strain and how to deal with it highlighted President Jon Wefald's State of the University speech Friday.

"We're all bleeding on this," Wefald told a group of administrators, faculty and students at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, referring to the budget cuts the university is being forced to cope with.

Wefald said the four main sources of income for K-State are tuition and fees, state appropriations, grants and private gifts. He took the time to explain how each source of income has been affected and how the university will cope with the budget cuts of about $7.9 million.

Tuition and fees

A 25 percent increase in tuition was approved by the Board of Regents in summer 2002. Wefald said the increase will make K-State's tuition and fees more comparable to its peer universities. He said K-State always has had the lowest or second lowest

NEWSWORTHY

The Associated Press

The Bush administration insisted Sunday that the U.S. military can simultaneously fight terrorism and confront Iraq, as White House officials said Congress and the United Nations must act quickly to show resolve against Saddam Hussein. Members of Congress were split on whether it was wise to act within four weeks on an undefined resolution about Iraq.

Tom Daschle, D-S.D., Senate Majority leader, said Sunday that Congress will pass legislation before the November elections creating a Homeland Security Department. President Bush is threatening to veto the bill unless it gives him flexibility over the estimated 170,000 employees that would become part of the Cabinet agency.

Insisting that he and his friends bore no resentment toward anyone, one of the three Muslim medical students detained in a terror scare on a Florida highway said Sunday that the situation was a misunderstanding. Kambiz Butt, 25, said that he and Ayman Gheith, 27, and Omar Choudhary, 23, simply want to clear their names and be allowed to continue their education in the United States.

Indian soldiers shot and killed nine suspected Islamic rebels Sunday in Srinagar, India in a border sweep just hours before the start of Kashmir's crucial state elections. The shootout occurred after a key government minister survived an assassination attempt earlier in the day.

World Summit delegates live it up in South Africa

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

The 60,000 delegates (from 182 countries) to the recent World Summit on Sustainable Development in Johannesburg, South Africa, luxuriated not only in four- and five-star accommodations but an elegant food and drink layout, including tons of lobster, oysters, filet mignon, salmon, caviar, pate de foie gras, champagne, fine wines and mineral water (an estimated 60 African children die per day from contaminated water). The conference center, which cleared out hundreds of nearby trees to accommodate delegates' limousines, is only a few miles from the neighborhood of Alexandra, one of Africa's poorest.

In San Francisco, two adult dodge ball leagues formed recently (the San Francisco Bombardment Society and the S.F. Blood Warriors), with rules similar to the children's playground game. One organizer said the game "is a nice way of pegging people in the face (with the soft rubber ball) and getting away with it." And, he said, "Certain things never change. Some people look like they're going to get hit, so you go after (them)."

No attention to the news

College student Maxim Segalov, an apparently harmless passenger, forced the landing of an American Airlines flight in Salt Lake City and his subsequent ejection when he alarmed the crew by trying to recharge a size-AA battery by heating it with his cigarette lighter. And the St. Louis Post-Dispatch reported in July that a passenger was detained at St. Louis' Lambert Field because for some reason he had packed in his checked luggage his cute, personal alarm clock, which is a clock outfitted with six toy sticks of dynamite.

Cliches come to life

Sophia Reitan fell and broke her arm when a Pentecostal Upper Room Tabernacle minister pushed the evil spirits from her forehead, and no one caught her when she swooned backward. She settled with the church for $80,000. And even though Clarence Cromwell, 29, fully confessed to police that he had killed a man, a judge in Brooklyn, N.Y., set him free because officers forgot to read him his Miranda rights. And according to a police report in the Hesperia (Calif.) Star: "An elderly man who lived on the 10700 block of 'G' Avenue suffered a heart attack while engaged in sexual intercourse and died April 2."

Our animal friends

Researchers at England's Cambridge University, and others in Tallahassee, Fla., and Cleveland, are training dogs to screen patients for prostate and lung cancers by detecting distinct smells of tumors in patients' breath. One researcher reported a success rate of 87 percent, which rivals that of some expensive technology. The genesis of the research was a 1989 journal article reporting that a border collie attacked a woman's mole that turned out to be a malignant melanoma and ignored her after the mole was removed.

Among Recent Animals in the News: the Asian paradise tree snake, which actually flies by thrusting itself from high places, flattening out and undulating its body, and a species of millipede from the West Indies, which, when zoo-dwelling capuchin and owl monkeys rubbed them on their fur, caused the monkeys to go into a delirious frenzy, similar to the way cats react to catnip.

Supposedly Lower Orders of Animals: Recently, the journal Science reported that chimpanzees in West Africa have learned to smack certain nuts with specially chosen stones at precisely the correct strength that will break open the delicate shell without obliterating the food inside and that crows have been observed bending discarded wires in just the right configuration for use in retrieving food from hard-to-reach places.

Also, in the last month ...

Doctors examining rugby star Jamie Ainscough's lingering arm injury finally located the problem: Opponent Martin Gleeson's tooth was found embedded in Ainscough's arm, from a July match. Firefighters acknowledged a particularly pesky fire, which burned for more than 50 hours before being extinguished, at a Kingsford Charcoal plant.

High school students perform at half-time of game, parade for K-State Band Day

Musicians from 35 high school bands benefit from playing in front of 45,000 fans

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 35 high school bands marched through Manhattan streets Saturday as part of K-State's Band Day.

"It's very exhilarating," said Nathan Charbonneau, senior baritone player from Valley Heights High School. "You get goose bumps all over. It's fun."

Charbonneau was participating in his second K-State Band Day, which involved a parade from Aggieville through downtown Manhattan and a halftime performance at the K-State-Eastern Illinois football game.

He said he thought the day would be a good experience for the underclassmen who had not participated previously.

Carol Hood, band director at Valley Heights, said attending is sometimes difficult because so many band members are involved in other things.

But, she said, it forces the band to work hard early in the year.

"It makes us kick it up a level," Hood said. "We did lots of street marching to prepare for the parade."

Frank Tracz, director of bands at K-State, said the event requires a lot of planning.

"It takes lots of work to coordinate," Tracz said, "but it's worth it."

Ben Deaver, senior in music education and trombone player, agreed with Tracz.

"It's good for high schoolers to get involved," Deaver said, "but it's hectic from our standpoint."

Following the parade, the bands were bused to KSU Stadium to rehearse for the half-time performance.

Tracz said there was less time to rehearse this year because the new turf requires extra care before games. He said there was only about an hour to coordinate the three dozen bands participating.

"It puts us in kind of a time crunch," Tracz said. "We'll just have to be better at what we do."

Dirk Calgrove, band director from Nemaha Valley High School in Seneca, said his band was as prepared as possible.

Calgrove said the Nemaha Valley band rehearsed every day of class, the drum line rehearsed once a week and the flag corps rehearsed two or three times a week.

Nicole Donnert | COLLEGIAN

Flag team member Apple Lotis, of Caney Valley High school in Caney, Kan., spins in a circle as part of a routine.

"It's just going to be an awesome experience," Calgrove said. "It will be the only experience like this for a lot of them."

For many of the high school students, the chance to perform in front of more than 45,000 fans offered a valuable opportunity.

"If you mess up, it's not as noticeable," Mitzi Holland, Lacrosse High School junior, said.

In addition to the musical aspect, Tracz said the event provides good exposure to K-State for high school students.

"It's a great way to get 2,300 students on campus," Tracz said. "It's a great recruiter and a good musical and educational experience for high school students."

TO THE POINT Students should support local music scene

Believe it, Manhattan has a music scene.

In the past week, there were eight concerts in Manhattan, featuring local bands as well as bands from Austin, Texas, Tulsa, Okla., and Kansas City, Mo. among other areas. People who complain of not being able to find live music in town are not looking very hard.

This is an exciting time for our town's music scene because new venues have been host to more music. In the past month, seven nightspots in Aggieville alone have been host to live entertainment. Add that to three open mic nights in town, and you have a music scene that might not be thriving, but is at least on an upswing.

As a college town, Manhattan music is consistently downplayed by people who point out the superiority of Lawrence music. Due to the long tradition of Lawrence music and its proximity to Kansas City, creative musicians thrive in the town. Manhattan never will have the natural advantages of Lawrence, but that doesn't mean people have to settle for a town with no bands.

The answer is to support local live music by going to shows. Plenty of musicians are playing in this town. Just give them a chance.

SCHOOL CHOICE

Vouchers match students' abilities with most appropriate schools

Freedom is precious these days.

It's time for Americans to take freedom into their own hands and promote it within their country.

Nothing is more freeing than a quality education. Without it, people are bound to the shackles of their misunderstandings of the world. A child with a learning disability who never received the right training won't be able to work to her potential. A poor child from a sub-standard, urban school system won't be able to get a scholarship.

The solution is simple: make every school a private one. Don't let the government tell you where to send your kids.

Instead, give every child a voucher - a ticket to the school of his or her choice. Using citizens' money, the voucher would pay for tuition. That would be like getting a private education for free.

Everything would change. All the barriers that have defined public education would be broken down. Here are the two largest problems with today's system:

Barrier: different learners

Let's be honest. Public schools simply cannot match up to private schools.

They must serve the public. They have to accommodate gifted children, children with disabilities and everybody in between.

Have you been bored in class, waiting for others to catch up? Or struggled with a subject that everyone else understood? It's hard for teachers to make class for everyone.

Take it to the next level and imagine you have a child with special needs.

These students need extra attention - attention public schools struggle to give.

Private schools, however, are all designed differently. Some, like parochial schools, are designed for families with certain backgrounds. Others help deaf children or students who display accelerated math and science skills.

Barrier: physical location

Did you know your parents probably used the school district as a factor in picking a house? And they have been subject to all the changes the district has seen since? If we used vouchers, the only thing they would think about is how close they are to a school they like.

Children living in poorly run districts have trouble getting out of the cycle of dropping out. Vouchers would allow those students to go where they need to be to stay in school and prepare for life.

Opponents will say vouchers are too costly. But, in 1996, the average tuition for all private schools was $3,116, less than half of the $6,857 cost at public schools, according to David Boaz and R. Morris Barrett in their Cato Institute briefing paper. A reasonable voucher would be only $3,000, they said. Therefore, many private-school students are getting a quality education, while some public-school students are getting a less individualized education - at a higher cost.

Restructuring the education system would be a daunting task. The nation's educators and families would have to brace themselves for the change. But American students' education, not easy implementation, needs to be our priority.

DANA STRONGIN

CHRISTOPHER HARROP

Conservatives, libertarians and yes, even some liberals, have jumped onto the ideological bandwagon known as school vouchers.

Words such as "choice," "freedom" and "competition" are thrown around, yet the true nature of tax-funded vouchers at the federal and state levels do not apply to the lofty aspirations of less government involvement in education and more quality education in the classroom.

Take for example the current public schooling system - taxpayer-funded and made available/compulsory to the public that funds it. Advocates of school vouchers cite benefits allowing families to choose the schools children attend, and create a competitive business environment in the education field.

To libertarians and free-market supporters, this sounds like the perfect economic model. To others, it is a wolf in sheep's clothing. Tax-funded vouchers are just what they state to be - tax-funded. Public funds will be utilized to educate America's youth. Just as much of the general population relies on the public school system due to federal and state funding, the same scenario will play out with parochial and other private institutions getting a lump of money straight from Uncle Sam.

When private schools become comfortable with this new funding, they will become complacent in their efforts to offer a quality education - the same argument advocates cite when proclaiming the trouble with the current public education system. These schools will have no compelling business interest to hire better teachers and administrators, nor will they feel obligated to provide better facilities, resources and staff to students.

True innovation in the private educational sector will require higher costs. The free market model doesn't apply to institutions luring upper-income families into sending their children to private schools without the aid provided by tax-funded vouchers.

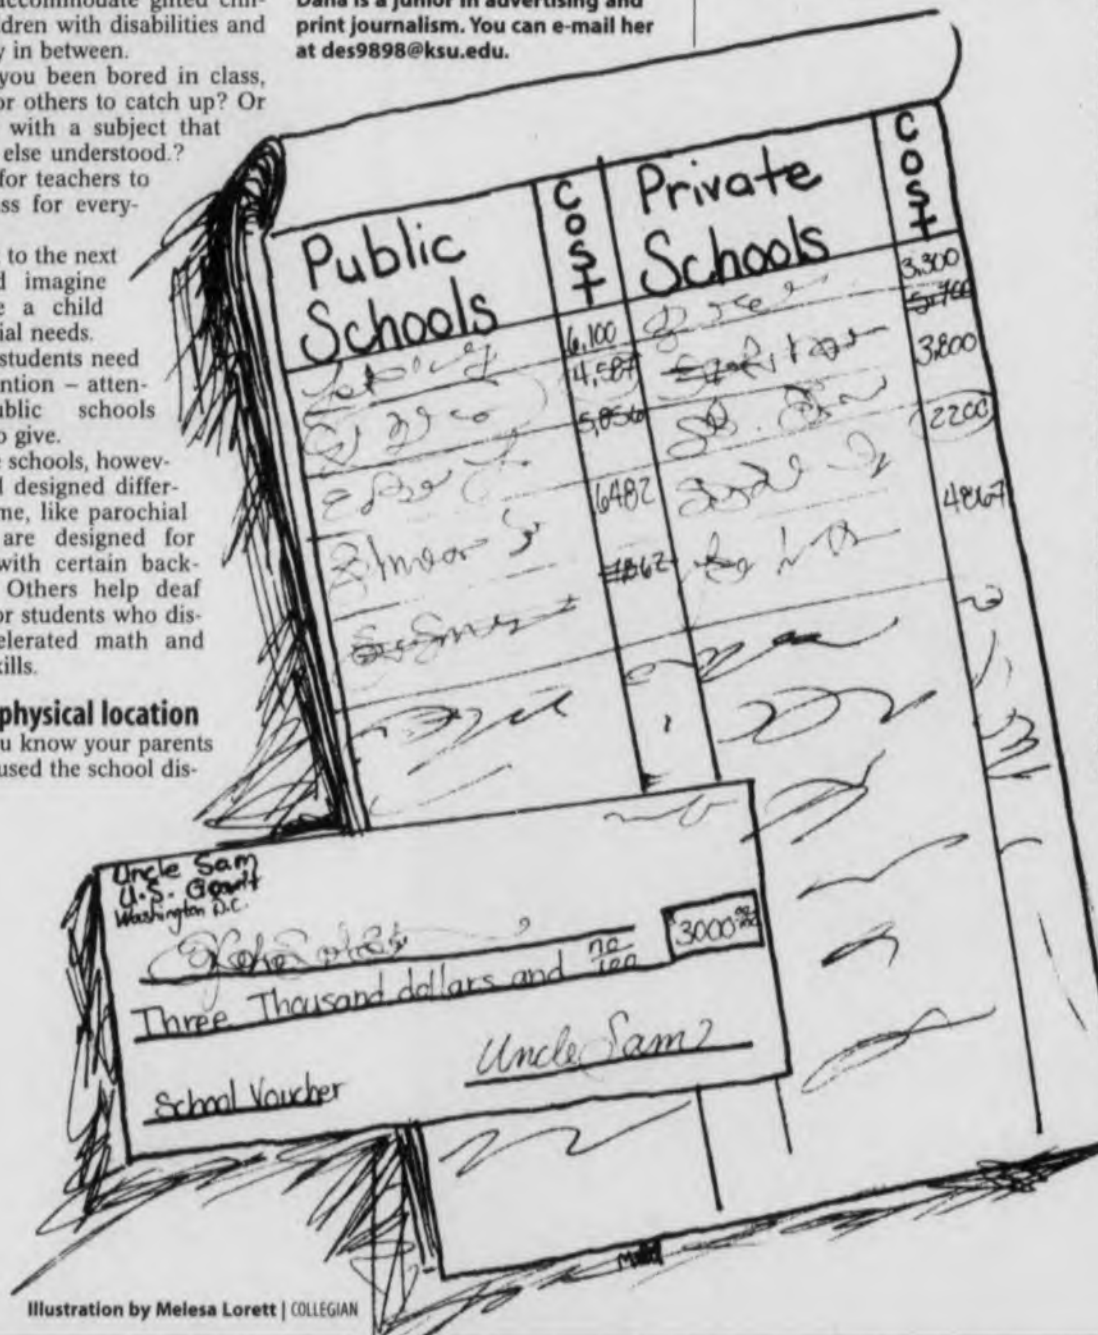

Another unavoidable issue with federally and state-funded voucher programs is the ongoing questioning of the line of separation between church and state. Apparently, voucher advocates have no qualms with using public dollars to go directly to non-secular institutions.

The worst aspect of the respecting of religious groups through an act of the government is that the Bush administration admits the problem and accepts it based upon precedence. The oft-mentioned No Child Left Behind Act of 2001 is supported on the Department of Education's Web site concerning this area of church and state debate at www.ed.gov/PressReleases/06-2002/06272002b.html.

Our policy is to accept the flaws of yesterday while we implement the boondoggles of tomorrow. If choice, freedom and competition are the ends desired by voucher advocates, those advocates must first take a critical look at the means to those ends.

Reverting schools back to how they operated 150 years ago would allow proponents of school choice and the free market to keep education and politics from mixing.

TO THE EDITOR

Journalists have moral obligation to encourage student safety; drinking game rules violate ethics, put publication in legal risks

Editor,

Faculty and alumni advisers of student groups, whether a greek-letter house, an academic club or a special interest organization, should know that risk management is just as important as advising and mentoring students.

We have a moral and legal responsibility to see that our students are educated and safe.

As an adviser to two student groups at K-State, I was greatly disturbed that our university's Pace Maker Award-winning student newspaper would publish Dan Smith's compilation of drinking game rules in the Sept. 13 edition.

What were you thinking?

All it will take, Mr. Smith, is for one K-State student to play these games and get seriously hurt or even die from alcohol poisoning.

That has happened on far, far too many campuses.

You've opened up yourself and one of the nation's top student newspapers to liability if that student's parents proved you were responsible for giving their son or daughter the know-how to drink irresponsibly.

Don't try to hide behind our journalist's Constitutional protection in the First Amendment.

I've taken the late professor Roberta Applegate's Law of Mass Communications class right there in Kedzie Hall one floor up from the Collegian newsroom.

I understand the principles behind libel and privacy laws, etc., and why the Bill of Rights protects the media.

But your column doesn't fall into any of those protected privileges.

Journalists have a moral obligation to walk on a higher plain of accountability, not beneath it.

Further, anyone who publishes the "rules" of drinking games smacks me right in the face because it trivializes the risk management responsibilities that civil authorities, K-State and our national organizations expect advisers - and students - to uphold.

Volleyball team goes 0-3 at South Florida tournament during weekend

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A .500 record was probably the last thing on the K-State volleyball team's mind as it traveled to Florida this weekend.

To do that, the Cats would have to drop all three games at the USF Adidas Invitational and stagger into Wednesday's match with Nebraska with no wins against top-25 opponents this season.

And that's exactly what they did.

The Cats (4-4) lost matches to South Florida, Michigan State and Georgia Tech during the weekend, going 0-3 in

Next action

The Cats will be back at home Wednesday, when they open their Big 12 conference season against Nebraska. Opening serve is scheduled for 7 p.m.

their trip to Florida.

In Friday's match with South Florida, the Wildcats were out-hit (70-62) and out-dug (65-58) by the Bulls, as South Florida took the match in four games.

Junior outside hitter Cari Jensen led the Wildcats with 16 kills, while sophomore middle blocker Lisa Martin collected a career-best 11 kills on .526 hitting.

On Saturday, the Cats dropped a close match with No. 19 Michigan State 31-29, 30-25, 22-30, 30-27, ensuring the Cats would not leave Florida with a winning tournament record.

The two straight losses were the Wildcats' first since opening the 2001 season with back-to-back losses to No. 5 Hawaii and No. 7 UCLA.

Statistically K-State and MSU were neck and neck.

Both teams tallied 64 kills and 62 digs, while also committing 14 service errors each. But the Spartans dominated the Cats defensively, out-blocking K-State 14.5 to seven.

Gabby Guerre posted a career-high 12 kills and added 46 assists, while Lauren Goehring chipped in 10 kills and three aces.

Although, things were bad for the Cats during the first two matches, they got even worse in the third.

K-State extended its losing streak to three matches for the first time since 1999, as the Wildcats dropped another four-game match, this time to Georgia Tech 28-30, 30-24, 30-26, 30-26.

The Wildcats haven't lost three straight since Oct. 27-Nov. 3, 1999, when they dropped matches against Texas Tech, Nebraska and Colorado.

In the match with the Yellow Jackets, the Cats had a season-high 83 digs and five blocks but were out-hit 70-69 and hit just .205 for the match.

Martin broke her career-high in kills for the second consecutive match with 16, while outside hitter Jennifer Pollard added her second double-double in as many matches with 16 kills and 21 digs.

The Cats will next be in action at 7 p.m. Wednesday against Nebraska. It will be K-State's conference opener.

K-State tames Panther offense; Cat offense takes 1st quarter off

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another Division I-AA opponent faced, another one romped.

Despite the wind and rain, K-State had no problems getting past Eastern Illinois on Saturday, 63-13.

At least for three quarters it didn't.

K-State (3-0) was up just 15-13 after 15 minutes of play, with the offense only seeing two minutes of action in the opening quarter.

The Cats scored two touchdowns, though — one on a blocked punt, and the other on a 95-yard Terence Newman kickoff return.

This left the defense to see a majority of the snaps in the quarter, playing against an offense that was having its way with the Cats.

"We played pretty much every snap of the first quarter," linebacker Terry Pierce said. "I was getting frustrated with the fact they were running a totally different offense and they were doing so much shifting that we hadn't worked on because we didn't expect them to do it."

"Then every time we weren't out there, they were scoring in one play so it was an ongoing process that first quarter."

Eastern Illinois (0-2) had 25 offensive plays in the quarter, compared to just three for K-State.

Where was Eli?

Back-up QB Eli Roberson didn't take a snap on Saturday. Coach Bill Snyder wouldn't disclose specifics, but said the junior was not ready to play.

"When I say not ready to play, I mean his health was not where it needs to be," he said.

Snyder said Roberson is likely to be "healthy" for the Cats game against USC next weekend.

The Panthers also had two sustained drives in the quarter, both 11 plays for 80 yards, led by quarterback Tony Romo, who completed 13 of 14 pass attempts, throwing for 120 yards.

Snyder said he was very impressed with Romo's abilities.

"Romo is a great quarterback — 13 out of 14, we can't even do that in pregame warm-ups," Snyder said.

"They put you in that kind of bind. Our guys can make plays if we can get them lined up right."

Not lining up right kept the Cats from shutting down Eastern Illinois offensively, Pierce said.

The biggest problem for K-State players, he said, was the fact they couldn't make adjustments and talk with coaches because they were on the field the whole time.

"We definitely were behind that first quarter," Pierce said. "We weren't understanding

Defense recovers from poor 1st half; secondary grabs 3 interceptions

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the first quarter of Saturday's 63-13 Wildcat trouncing of Eastern Illinois, K-State's secondary was having some problems getting time to breathe.

Eastern Illinois' Tony Romo completed 13 of his first 14 passes, an attack that kept the Wildcat defensive backs scrambling for the majority of the first half.

And while the defense might have been reeling a little in this time as well, Coach Bill Snyder said the effects of Eastern Illinois' opening offensive production were welcomed.

"I was glad it happened," Snyder said.

"As I told our team last week, we needed to be able to condition ourselves to play 70 to 75 snaps a ball game. But I didn't realize they were going to get them all in the first quarter."

After that first quarter, it looked like the Wildcats' secondary settled in nicely.

Midway through the second quarter, Randy Jordan closed in on a pass near the sideline and got the offense back on the field with a one-handed interception.

On Eastern Illinois' ensuing drive, Bobby Walker followed suit, picking off Romo on the 25 and returning it to the 40.

Eastern Illinois running back J.R. Taylor is taken down by K-State's defensive tackle Corey White (62) and defensive end Henry Bryant (90) during the third quarter of the wildcats 63-13 victory over the Panthers. K-State faces USC this Saturday at Wagner Field.

Rashad Washington, who blocked a punt earlier in the game, capped off the defensive backs' performance in the third quarter, intercepting a pass and taking it back 40 yards to make the score 50-14.

By the end of the game, however, Eastern Illinois did pass for 187 yards, eclipsing K-State's aerial effort by 65 yards.

"I'm going to have to sit down and watch some tape," Snyder said. "There are some things I'm still not quite certain about in regards to how we played against the pass."

"There were some things we did that we hadn't done a lot of before, and we're just kind of feeling our way around with it. We just didn't quite have a knack for playing the way we needed to."

Snyder added that there were highlights in the way the Wildcats defended the pass against Eastern Illinois.

"If you take away the first two drives and get settled in, after that, I thought they did relatively well," he said.

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said the complexity of Eastern Illinois' offense had a lot to do with K-State's early struggles in the secondary.

"I thought we were on our heels at the start," Elliott said. "We've got some new guys who haven't played much football back there, and they gave us all kinds of shifts and motions and adjustments."

"Our guys were kind of spinning," he said. "But I'm

Director, not actors makes 'Stealing Harvard' worth watching

Having Tom Green on the bill will help "Stealing Harvard" sell tickets, but it's another Canadian who makes the movie funny.

"Kids in the Hall" alum Bruce McCulloch steals the laughs in this movie from behind the camera.

Jason Lee plays John Plummer, a standard straight-man character in a curious situation. John is barely breaking even in life. He's got a lot going for him, but there's always a catch.

He has a beautiful fiancée, but she weeps uncontrollably during sex, and his friends all think she is a hussy. He has a decent job selling personal medical equipment at a store called Home-Spital, but his boss is his future father-in-law who is always undermining him.

John has managed to establish an equilibrium between the pleasant and the not-so-pleasant aspects of his life, but it's a fragile balance that could collapse under the slightest strain.

The implied plot complication arises when John is reminded of a promise he made to his niece while she was in elementary school.

After she misspelled the word tarp in a spelling bee, John consoled his niece by saying he would pay for her college education.

Unfortunately for John, the moment was documented in a home video, and now his niece has been accepted to Harvard.

John has the money his niece needs, but it's money he and his fiancée had been saving to buy a house and get married. John is afraid to disappoint either of the expectant ladies and resolves to raise the money through any means necessary.

John turns to his chemically unbalanced landscaping friend Duff (Green) for ideas, and the two quickly settle on crime. The two proceed to fumble their way through break-ins and armed robbery in search of $30,000.

"Stealing Harvard" is a rather peculiar comedy. The film's intricate blend of humor is a little dry, slightly warped and remarkably shrewd. McCulloch's influence is obvious throughout the movie and is the basis of the film's vitality. He has developed a very distinctive and alluring directorial style. McCulloch craftily makes scenes funnier through sets, props and camera angles.

McCulloch is able to have his actors perform exactly the way they should. Proving his consistency as a comedic actor, Jason Lee pulls off another strong performance. Tom Green is surprisingly good when he and McCulloch bring a collective vision of Canadian comedy on screen.

The film also benefits from some strong secondary performances. Dennis Farina, John C. McGinley and McCulloch himself keep the film lively and interesting. Chris Penn, Sean Penn's portly brother, dominates the screen during his brief appearance simply because he has gotten so fat.

"Stealing Harvard" is quirky and perceptive in a way that is reminiscent of "The Kids in the Hall." It creates a lot of hope for future McCulloch endeavors.

"LIMITED LIFETIME GUARANTEE"

Album review By JJ Duncan

Making college music for the masses is the kind of thing the Goo Goo Dolls have been doing for years, and now newcomer Mark Copely is trying his hand at it.

The talented, accessible vocals of Copely carry him through his otherwise unremarkable debut.

Acoustic guitars and chorus harmonies combine with an upbeat musical take on the pangs of life as seen from the perspective of an attractive rock singer to make "Limited Lifetime Guarantee" a good album — just nothing special.

Copely claims he was inspired to become a more prolific songwriter after a night car collision with a moose left him in a hospital bed.

Unfortunately for him, traumatic experiences aren't all that's necessary to become a great musical artist.

When a new singer/songwriter hasn't spent enough time cultivating his art, it shows. You end up getting a sterile, studio-polished album that sounds good but doesn't have what it takes to hold its place in your five-disc changer.

In other words, Copely needs to pay his dues before he can sing the blues.

The album's producers commit a musical faux pas in front-loading the album with the best three tracks, including single "Surprise," and leaving the rest of the album with little redeeming value.

"Limited Lifetime Guarantee" has a decent sound, but Copely needs to hit another moose and create a distinct sound before making another album.

'My Big Fat Greek Wedding' benefits from simple, sincere, well-filmed screenplay

Every now and then a movie comes along that doesn't need full-page ads in Rolling Stone and commercials shoved between "The Real World" and "Total Request Live" to sell it to an audience.

The lost art of selling a movie by word of mouth based on the film's quality is what has propelled "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" to higher earnings nearly every week it has been in theaters. The movie maintained its No. 2 spot in the Friday and Saturday box office this weekend, passing the $100-million mark in its 22nd week playing.

So what is so special about this low-budget, $3-million movie that keeps it floating at No. 2? How can it bring in more money every week when "Swimfan" debuts at No. 1 and falls this week to No. 6?

It isn't flashy special effects, sex or shameless promotion. It isn't even star power. The movie benefits from a simple, sincere and well-filmed screenplay that people enjoy.

That's it. It's a sweet little movie that got much more popular than anyone thought it would.

Toula Portokalos (Nia Vardalos, "Meet Prince Charming") is a 30-year-old single Greek, and to her family's dismay, she shows no promise of getting married anytime soon. In her own words, Toula says that women in her Greek family are expected to cook, marry Greek boys and make Greek babies.

Toula's large yet close-knit family keeps tabs on every cousin, uncle, aunt, sister and brother in four generations and is very proud of its heritage. The pride is so much that when her father Gus (Michael Constantine, "Thinner") finds out she has been seeing a very American white Anglo-saxon Protestant, he can't find enough words to express his grief and frustration.

With 27 first cousins and no one in the family married to a non-Greek, Toula knows it will be difficult for her boyfriend, Ian, to gain the family's acceptance. After all, she was shocked herself to learn that he has only two cousins and no siblings.

The movie predictably evolves into a celebration of heritage that says to be proud of where you're from while not letting it dictate how you live.

Yes, it is predictable, and yes, it's a simple star-crossed-lovers plot. The film's simple yet sincere plot is what keeps it so charming.

In fact, it's so innocent that the audience can actually believe that Toula is a virgin in repeated make-out sessions in a steamy car with Ian when they leave each other a little more tousled each time.

Nearly every player in this movie is doing basic, slightly over-emphasized character acting that presents the plot in such an easily understood setting that anyone can empathize with these characters.

The movie is by no means any sort of film-making achievement. It doesn't have to be. It's the best romantic comedy of the year, and Meg Ryan isn't even in it.

Speaker shares Afghanistan images

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A smiling girl in front of a building marred by bullet holes. A young boy with a bloody leg after stepping on a land mine. And a group of girls before their first day of school in five years.

These were several pictures presented during "Images of Afghanistan: Reconstructing a Heritage, Revitalizing a Culture" Friday night at the International Student Center.

"There's not much that doesn't have bullet holes," keynote speaker Rosemary Talab, professor of secondary education said.

The presentation was part of the annual meeting of the Flint Hills Chapter of the United Nations Association of the United States of America, an organization dedicated to strengthening the United Nations system and enhancing U.S. participation in it.

Talab and her husband, Dan, president of the chapter, traveled to Afghanistan in May and documented their experience through photographs and video clips.

Dan started the presentation with a brief history of Afghanistan and what led to its current war-torn condition.

He described its rule under the Taliban and showed a burqa, the required clothing for women.

"If anyone had any hair showing, they were punished," he said.

However, they no longer are required. Rosemary, who has blond hair and lightly colored eyes, said she purchased a wig and dark contacts when she went there.

"But I didn't need any of it," she said. "No one cared."

The people there were amicable, she said.

"Everyone was lovely," she said. "Just like every other country I've been to. I was scared, but I didn't need to be."

Rosemary shared pictures from Kabul and Mazar-e-sharif, where she traveled, and from Badakhshan and Sakhi, where her husband traveled.

She showed a video clip of the airport's terminal bus, which had a bullet hole where the driver was shot.

She also showed pictures of daily life, including food markets, streets in Kabul before U.S. bombings, shops and children riding bikes.

"Kabul used to be beautiful," she said. "I think it will be again someday."

Now, she said, there is no infrastructure.

"There were no phones, no electricity, no running water — nothing," Rosemary said.

They had to pay to make a call, and Rosemary discussed why she ate little and lost weight during her stay.

"The food was all fried," she said. "Plus, I didn't want to. There are so many people starving, you just don't feel right."

She also discussed Afghanistan's education. For the first time in years, women are allowed to go to school, but they do not have desks, chairs or tables in the classrooms.

"The future is looking good for these girls," Rosemary said. "And I think that the future is looking good for everyone else, too."

Officials say U.S. could fight war against Iraq

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Bush administration insisted Sunday that the U.S. military can simultaneously fight terrorism and confront Iraq, as White House officials said Congress and the United Nations must act quickly to show resolve against Saddam Hussein.

Members of Congress, however, were split on whether it was wise to act within four weeks on an undefined resolution about Iraq, as Secretary of State Colin Powell called for. There were signs of a possible stalemate before the midterm congressional elections in November.

"We don't know what this administration wants to do," Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle said on ABC's "This Week." He said President Bush had yet to ask for a resolution on Iraq.

Several leading lawmakers made clear they will consider such resolutions on their own timetable.

Daschle was noncommittal on whether Congress could pass such a resolution before Election Day, saying only that it was possible.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said it would help Bush if Congress acted before its planned mid-October recess.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., said he agreed with that timetable, but added that the resolution should not necessarily authorize force against Iraq.

He said on CBS's "Face the Nation" that he preferred "something that could get 100-to-nothing vote, something that says to the United Nations, 'look, we are really serious about this and we're all behind the effort to try to seek a consensus on dealing with Saddam Hussein.'"

On the diplomatic front,

Powell said he hoped that intensive work on drafting a resolution for the Security Council could begin by the end of this week.

He was optimistic about a vote by the Security Council within a few weeks.

The measure should give the Iraqi president "a matter of weeks" to comply with long-standing U.N. resolutions on his weapons program, Powell said.

He met with council members last week to win support for a tough resolution and planned to return to New York on Monday to resume the effort.

Some lawmakers, including Daschle, D-S.D., have questioned whether war with Iraq would undermine the hunt for al-Qaeda terrorists behind the Sept. 11 attacks.

what they were doing, and after that first quarter the coaches could sit us down and tell us the adjustments we needed to make."

From an offensive standpoint, an overworked defense translated into a bored offense, Ron Hudson, offensive coordinator said.

One of the Cats' biggest ongoing goals is to get the offense where it needs to be before conference play.

That obviously didn't happen in Saturday's contest,

Hudson said.

"I've never experienced anything like that," he said. "It makes our day shorter on Sunday, only having to look at 50 plays, but I don't know if that made our offense any better."

But the Cat offense made up for time not spent on the field in the first quarter, scoring 48 unanswered points on the Panthers to put the game out of reach.

With the conditions the way they were, K-State put more focus on the ground game, running the ball 40 times for a total of 230 yards.

But the big play in the passing attack was still there.

Marc Dunn threw two TDs on the day, a 19-yard pass to Thomas Hill, and a 58-yard bomb to Taco Wallace.

Although this was encouraging to see, Snyder said, the lost time is a big concern going into K-State game with Southern California.

"It's hard to fathom that you can go 13 minutes without an offensive snap," he said.

"That cost us a quarter of football for our offense."

Elliott said he was pleased with the overall resiliency of his defensive backs.

"That's the nature of the game," he said. "Their whole game plan was to try and get us confused. It worked for a while, and then we settled down and were okay after that."

Washington said the early torrent of success in the Eastern Illinois passing game had the defense winded.

"That's the most tired I've ever been," Washington said. "I had no wind left, but I knew I had to suck it up and be out there for the rest of the guys."

Washington added that the secondary showed some mettle by overcoming the challenge Eastern Illinois presented early in the ball game, and that they will continue to grow as a defensive unit.

"I think we're meshing together very well," he said. "We've made mistakes here and there, but as the season goes along, I think we'll get better and better."

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
103 Kedzie • 532-6560

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN
Matt Frost, senior in secondary education, plays his guitar during the Opus competition. Frost is the only member of Black Box Within who attends K-State.

OPUS | Local band awarded $400 for 1st place with high-energy set

gave thanks to members of Three Rivers Kennedy for helping to record the demo that got the band into the competition.

Ben Gray, bass player for Three Rivers Kennedy, said he recorded the band's demo in his basement in four hours.

"Addictive Behavior put on a back-to-school show the first day for Manhattan High School and asked us to play with a couple of other high school bands," he said. "We played and thought they were pretty awesome and told them we'd love to record them sometime, so I recorded their demo. It was kind of a last-minute deal, and we were in a hurry to get it done."

Sara Harvey, drummer for the Mathematics, said she was surprised and flattered by the results of the competition, and she hopes the band will play in Manhattan soon. Bandmate McCallum said he felt the right bands were rewarded, but personal biases factor into the results.

"You never know what the judges are thinking in something like this," he said.

FOOTBALL | After resting during 1st quarter, offense puts together scoring spree to throttle EIU

what they were doing, and after that first quarter the coaches could sit us down and tell us the adjustments we needed to make."

From an offensive standpoint, an overworked defense translated into a bored offense, Ron Hudson, offensive coordinator said.

One of the Cats' biggest ongoing goals is to get the offense where it needs to be before conference play.

That obviously didn't happen in Saturday's contest,

Hudson said.

"I've never experienced anything like that," he said. "It makes our day shorter on Sunday, only having to look at 50 plays, but I don't know if that made our offense any better."

But the Cat offense made up for time not spent on the field in the first quarter, scoring 48 unanswered points on the Panthers to put the game out of reach.

With the conditions the way they were, K-State put more focus on the ground game, running the ball 40 times for a total of 230 yards.

But the big play in the passing attack was still there.

Marc Dunn threw two TDs on the day, a 19-yard pass to Thomas Hill, and a 58-yard bomb to Taco Wallace.

Although this was encouraging to see, Snyder said, the lost time is a big concern going into K-State game with Southern California.

"It's hard to fathom that you can go 13 minutes without an offensive snap," he said.

"That cost us a quarter of football for our offense."

ARRESTS Americans linked to terrorists

arrests in New York were the latest salvos in an effort to disrupt domestic terrorist activities.

The five men in their 20s live within a few blocks of each other in the Buffalo suburb of Lackawanna, N.Y.

They trained at a camp where Osama bin Laden rallied the troops with a speech espousing his anti-American and anti-Israeli views, Thompson said.

U.S. Magistrate H. Kenneth Schroeder unsealed the complaint against Shafal Mosed, 24; Faysal Galab, 26; Sahim Alwan, 29; Yasein Taher, 24; and Yahya Goba, 25.

Their training in the al-Qaeda camp amounted to material support for a terrorist organization under a 1996 law.

If convicted, they each face up to 15 years in prison.

DEFENSE | Wildcats shake off rust, return to form

proud of the way they settled down and hung in there and got adjusted. As the game wore on, we got it stopped."

Elliott said he was pleased with the overall resiliency of his defensive backs.

"That's the nature of the game," he said. "Their whole game plan was to try and get us confused. It worked for a while, and then we settled down and were okay after that."

Washington said the early torrent of success in the Eastern Illinois passing game had the defense winded.

"That's the most tired I've ever been," Washington said. "I had no wind left, but I knew I had to suck it up and be out there for the rest of the guys."

Washington added that the secondary showed some mettle by overcoming the challenge Eastern Illinois presented early in the ball game, and that they will continue to grow as a defensive unit.

"I think we're meshing together very well," he said. "We've made mistakes here and there, but as the season goes along, I think we'll get better and better."

ERROR | Residents begin to feel effects of mistake

you were promised is not going to happen. It's just a misfortune that affected the school board, city, county and programs that depend on government funds."

After the error, city management and commissioners found themselves $968,000 over budget. The county's budget was $781,000 off and the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school board was $600,000 over.

On the day the error was reported, Bob Newsome, county commissioner, said the board convened and decided to use $750,000 that was scheduled for possible transportation and building renovation projects to absorb the budget shortfall.

Newsome said those projects would be put off. Those included renovations for two county office buildings and construction on Wildcat Road and Casement Drive.

"We wanted to use that money for those projects to balance the budget rather than raise taxes," Newsome said.

The city's solution wasn't that easy.

In the days before the error was discovered, Fehr was finishing the city's budget overview, which would be presented to and voted on by the commission.

But after Fehr found out about the change, he said he met with a management team to come up with three possible solutions to make up for almost $1 million in funding.

First, he said, the city could have made across the board cuts. Each city agency and department that receives city money would have faced cuts. But, Fehr said, that could have damaged some departments' abilities to provide services.

Second, the city could have increased property taxes by four mills. Again, if taxpayers took the full blow of the debt, that would have been too much to handle.

"That would have caused an uproar," said Fehr.

Also, Fehr said the city could have used the interest from the city's water and sewer reserve fund, a fund used for water utility improvements such as a new water tower or additions to a treatment plant.

Ultimately, the commission decided to combine all three of these solutions: $430,436 was cut from city funds, $250,000 from the emergency reserve fund was pulled, and one mil was added to the property tax levy for a total increase of $280,564.

"By using a blended solution, it won't have a dire effect," Bruce Snead, city commissioner, said. "If you use one method rather than a combination, the effects would be more dramatic."

Nevertheless, commissioners were hesitant to tap into the water reserves.

"We weren't too thrilled about that," Everett said. "Whenever you tap into cash reserves that is set up for a given purpose, you take away a portion of the footing that allows a plant expansion. If something happens to the plant and we need to tap into those dollars, we're going to have to look at other revenue sources."

Fehr said some agencies will feel the pinch of the city's budget cuts.

In all, 28 programs or departments received cuts. The Riley County Police Department took the largest cut at $85,700. Budgets for the fire department ($38,800), public works ($24,400) and parks and recreation ($44,600) also took significant cuts.

"Across the board, funds will have less resources," Snead said. "Everyone shared. There are certainly things that weren't hurt by the cuts. But everything was affected. Doing a mixed reaction of cuts was probably the most fair way to go."

Everett said the city could have cut even more from the budget.

"The commission did a fair job. More steps can be taken to prepare for a tougher budget process in the future," Everett said. "It's just like at home. If you know you'll receive fewer dollars, you may have to brown bag it or go without vacation. Some of the non-essentials are postponed."

tuition in the Big 12 Conference and has been in the lowest quartile among major state universities.

The increase, Wefald said, will bring K-State's tuition closer to the median of these comparison groups.

Wefald cited other instances when students have risen to the occasion to provide for the university, such as $5 million for the Hale Library addition and $12 million for the renovation of the K-State Student Union.

"I have been so overjoyed by the quality of students' response," he said. "Almost invariably, students have stepped up when they needed to."

Wefald said 20 percent of the money from tuition hikes would be allocated to financial aid for the neediest of students. He said this model is used by many other universities and will help reduce financial effects on the families with the lowest incomes.

State appropriations

Wefald praised the Kansas Legislature for implementing a tax increase last session.

"Kansas is a conservative state," Wefald said, "but when push comes to shove, they rally around the flag to do good things."

The $260 million tax increase saved K-State from an 18-percent cut, and instead, the university has to absorb a 6-percent cut.

Wefald pointed to other universities that did not receive additional tax money as examples of where K-State could be. He said Iowa State University has taken a 20 percent reduction in state funding, while the University of Missouri at Columbia has seen cuts of 37 percent.

Additional cuts are almost inevitable, Wefald said.

Grants

Wefald said K-State contributes more than $2.6 billion to the state's economy. Much of this is made possible through work done on research grants.

Wefald said the new food safety and security complex, for which ground was broken Friday morning, would be another good example of what the university can do for Kansas. The $40-million, five-building complex will play a large role in securing the nation's food.

"It is in America's national security interest to have this building," he said. "We will be right there when it comes to securing America's food."

Private gifts

The KSU Foundation raised more than $65 million in cash and deferred gifts last year, Wefald said.

The foundation raises money for scholarships and university programs. Last year, Wefald said, the foundation donated $35 million for university programs.

Other points of interest

In March, K-State was re-accredited for an additional 10 years by the North Central Association. Wefald said the NCA praised K-State for improving the quality of students, as well as the research and new physical facilities on campus.

Wefald thanked department heads and said K-State utilizes the Eisenhower model of delegated authority. He said this allows the deans and department heads to make their own decisions about what to cut, rather than the administration making those decisions for them.

The Sept. 11 attacks, Wefald said, made Americans more colorblind than before.

"People didn't see other colors or religions," he said, "just Americans."

Wefald said K-State has been making progress in diversity and affirmative action.

Student achievement is a good measure of how well the university is doing, Wefald said. K-State has had more recipients of the Rhodes, Marshall, Truman, Goldwater and Udall scholarships than any other public university.

Football player arrested last week

Consequences of wide receiver's run-in handled by team

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

A K-State football player was arrested late last week.

Sophomore receiver Fritz Antoine Polite, 3105 Yolanda, was arrested Friday morning for failure to appear in court for a traffic-related charge. Polite was arrested at 3:10 a.m. at 1632 McCain Lane.

Polite posted bail after he was taken to Riley County Jail, said Riley County Police Lt. Kurt Moldrup. Polite's bail was $139.50.

Doug Dull, director of Sports Information, did not specify any team consequences for Polite.

"We are going to let the judicial system run its course," Dull said. "Anything else will be handled as an internal team matter."

Suspects sought in robberies

Authorities investigate weekend encounters

By Tara Patty
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Suspects held victims at gunpoint during two aggravated robberies at 11:15 p.m. Sept. 14 and at 12:05 a.m. Sept. 15, the Riley County Police Department officials said.

Police received a 911 call in response to the first aggravated robbery from the victim, Eric Caldwell of Manhattan, RCPD Lt. Kurt Moldrup said. Caldwell told police he had been walking west in the south alley of the 1000 block of Bluemont when two black males approached him from the opposite direction.

According to reports, as Caldwell passed them, one of the two put what Caldwell believed to be a semi-automatic handgun to Caldwell's head and demanded that Caldwell hand over what he had.

The two suspects took Caldwell's wallet, cell phone and watch. Caldwell described one suspect to police as 5 feet 10 inches and 165 pounds with a shaved head. He was wearing a dark shirt with light-colored long sleeves and baggy pants. The other suspect was 6 feet and 220 pounds with bushy hair. He was wearing a dark hooded sweatshirt. They were last seen headed south from the location of the robbery.

The second robbery, which has not been connected to the first at this time, took place in the parking lot of Manhattan AREA Technical College at 3136 Dickens. Danielle Mainville, Nicole Schmidt and Thomas Pacelli were in Mainville's vehicle when a full-sized four-door vehicle, possibly a Honda, parked beside them.

Four black males in their early 20s got out of their car and approached Mainville's

Iraq to permit U.N. inspections

After 4-year absence, weapons inspectors given permission to return

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Iraq agreed Monday to allow the return of weapons inspectors in order to "remove any doubts" it still has weapons of mass destruction, the Mideast nation said in a letter to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

"The government of the republic of Iraq has based its decision concerning the return of inspectors on its desire to complete the implementation of relevant security council resolutions and to remove any doubts that Iraq still possesses weapons of mass destruction."

Iraq's Foreign Minister Naji Sabri gave the letter to Annan, who announced the stunning turnabout in Iraq's position on the inspectors.

In the letter, Iraq called on the Security Council members, which includes the United States, to "respect the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of Iraq."

The letter further said that Iraq was responding to an earlier appeal by Annan for Baghdad's compliance with Security Council resolutions calling for unfettered access to inspectors, and to an appeal by the Arab League and other Islamic countries.

Annan forwarded the letter to all 15 members of the U.N. Security Council and to the chief weapons inspector, Hans Blix.

It was not clear when the council would meet to consider the letter.

"I can confirm to you that I have received a letter from the Iraqi authorities conveying its decision to allow the return of inspectors without conditions to continue their work," a pleased Annan told reporters, nearly four years after inspectors left Iraq.

"There is good news," Sabri said moments earlier. The Iraqi foreign minister refused to comment further and left U.N. headquarters after a day of negotiations on the text of the letter.

UFM fencing class teaches basics of sport

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The first time he was taught, Bill Meyer hated fencing.

Meyer was living on an Army base in Germany when his parents hired a fencing tutor.

The tutor, a former Nazi secret police officer, taught Meyer an illegal form of fencing known as mensur fencing.

"Have you ever seen the old movies where Germans have scars on their faces?" Meyer said. "Those scars are from mensur fencing."

Mensur fencing, also known as distance fencing, does not allow the participants to move their feet, Meyer said. The participants stand a certain distance apart and try to cut each other's faces.

The style was outlawed, Meyer said, because it fosters extreme aggressive behavior, although some secret mensur societies exist even today.

"It's a stupid thing," Meyer said. "It's colossally stupid."

Meyer quit the lessons after less than six months.

But when he returned to the United States, Meyer fell in love with the style of fencing more commonly recognized — Olympic-style fencing.

"All the moving back and forth, that's what I thought fencing should be like," he said.

Meyer now has been fencing for about 20 years, and has been teaching classes at the UFM for four years. He teaches beginning, intermediate and competition-level classes.

Kaci Stubbs, sophomore in open-option, is enrolled in the beginning class.

Stubbs said she always has been interested in fencing, but has not had the opportunity to take a class until now.

"I like the part of your brain it uses," Stubbs said. "Plus, I'm small, so I'm better with reflexes."

The beginning class has only had two sessions, but Stubbs said she expects it to get more challenging when they begin wearing body armor.

"I didn't realize we would be using all the equipment," she said.

"It will be more difficult when we put it all on and some of our senses are impaired."

Rachel Rhoades, junior in interior architecture, said she enrolled in the class to relieve stress.

Spending 20 to 30 hours per week in studio is stressful, Rhoades said, and she thought the fencing class would offer a healthy alternative.

"So far, it's very cool," Rhoades said. "Especially all the work you do with your feet."

But, Rhoades said, there is more to the class than just the physical aspect.

"I've always had a fascination with sword play," she said.

K-State not likely to adopt mandatory attendance policy

Professors' individual policies best way to keep students in class

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

The decision to attend class is left up to students despite several universities' shift to mandatory attendance policies.

The University of Alabama recently considered requiring mandatory attendance for some freshmen and sophomore classes. However, Al Cochran, Faculty Senate president, said K-State is not likely to adopt such a policy.

Cochran said that during the 23 years he has worked at K-State, a mandatory attendance policy never has been discussed.

David Dvorak, junior in computer science, said mandatory attendance is not something he would support.

"We pay to go to class, we pay for the teachers' time, and it should be our decision whether or not we want to show up," he said. "Mandatory attendance policies are the kind of thing we left behind in high school."

Because of the variety of classes, Cochran said a mandatory attendance rule would not work.

"We have so many different kinds of classes here at K-State," he said. "A policy like that probably would not work for us."

Individual professors can make their own attendance policies.

John McCulloh, history professor, said he determines whether to use an attendance policy based on class size.

"In some of my smaller upper-level classes, I have policies," he said. "If students have three or more unexcused absences, their grade drops."

McCulloh said he had a good reason for adopting an attendance policy in his classes.

"I did not have one for a long time, but I became convinced that when I do require attendance, the students have much better exam scores," he said.

Phil Nel, English professor, said he always has had attendance policies for his classes.

"The point of the policy is it is an implied threat that I have the right to act on, and I will act on it," Nel said. "You can have a policy and make

NEWSWORTHY

The Associated Press

A Yemeni-born American who was arrested in Bahrain was charged in a federal indictment as a coconspirator with five others who were arrested in New York, federal officials said Monday. A sixth defendant, Mukhtar al-Bakri, 22, was named on Monday. Al-Bakri faces the same charges as the other five, officials said.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said Monday the U.N. Security Council is moving toward the U.S. position on Iraq, but France objected strongly to the Bush administration's insistence that Iraqi President Saddam Hussein must go.

Under intense lobbying by industry groups, a White House panel studying ways to protect America's high-tech backbone has dropped several security ideas and turned others into topics for discussion rather than government mandates, according to the latest version of the plan.

The Securities and Exchange Commission has opened an inquiry into former General Electric chief Jack Welch's lavish retirement perks, which became public in divorce papers. General Electric said Monday it learned of the informal inquiry after its board agreed to take back many of the benefits at Welch's request.

Voters in Kashmir, India, defied threats by Muslim militants and turned out in greater numbers than expected Monday for state elections. One civilian was killed, thousands of soldiers were deployed across the Himalayan province, and the separatists failed to significantly disrupt the voting.

Corrections and clarifications

There is a clarification from Thursday's Collegian. Junior fullback Travis Wilson pleaded no contest to an obstruction of the legal process charge. He will enter into diversion for a criminal damage to property charge. There was an error in Monday's Collegian. Friday's groundbreaking was for the bioprocessing industrial value-added program building. The Collegian regrets the error.

FACES IN THE CROWD

Rolling Stones' Richards angry with bandmate

The Associated Press

Mick Jagger's knighthood caused a rocky patch for the Rolling Stones, with guitarist Keith Richards saying he went "berserk" after hearing the news.

In an interview with Mojo, Richards said he responded with "cold rage at his blind stupidity."

The Stones are doing a series of 40th anniversary concerts, but Richards said Jagger's decision to accept the title of Sir Mick nearly ended the tour.

"It was enraging. I threatened to pull out the tour — went berserk, bananas," Richards said.

Jagger's knighthood, for his services to music, was announced in a June honors list to mark Queen Elizabeth II's official birthday.

Rolling Stones drummer Charlie Watts said Jagger deserved the title, but that Richards should have been offered one, too.

"Blimey, some of the people who had those medals, or whatever you call them, are horrendous, so Mick certainly deserves one," Watts said.

"If Paul McCartney got one, Mick should have got one. But if Mick got one, Keith should have been offered one, and that would have really been something else."

Roxette singer has cancer

Marie Fredriksson of the Swedish pop duo Roxette has been diagnosed with a brain tumor, manager Marie Dimberg said Monday.

The small tumor was found after Fredriksson fainted and hit her head last Wednesday at her Stockholm home.

The 44-year-old singer was examined at the Karolinska hospital and is resting in her home while doctors decide how the tumor can be treated, Dimberg said.

Nicholson attends premiere

Jack Nicholson was among the celebrities attending the opening of "Fellow Traveler" at the Malibu Stage Company.

"Fellow Traveler," a story of the collapse of communism in Russia, was written by John Herman Shaner and directed by Charles Marowitz, and stars Harold Gould, who's appeared in movies including "Stuart Little" and "Patch Adams."

Shaner said Sunday he was proud that Nicholson made it to Thursday's premiere, which took place at a small converted theater in Point Dume that once was a Lutheran church.

TO THE POINT Universities shouldn't force class attendance

A mandatory attendance policy?
Don't even think about it.

Though it appears this might be a university trend across the nation, the issue is best kept at other colleges, not at K-State. This practice is absurd and should have been left at the doors of the high schools.

The University of Alabama is the latest to consider this policy, which officials said will help students' exam scores.

The university officials didn't cite any scientific studies that support that claim. Furthermore, it shouldn't be left to administrators to decide students' attendance practices considering students pay for the time they spend in the classroom.

If nothing else, the students are wasting money by not attending class. If students want a degree, they'll attend enough classes to get it. It appears that these universities are more interested in bumping their attendance statistics than doing what is best for the students.

K-State would be foolish to implement this system, considering its amount of Rhodes, Truman, and Goldwater scholars. It's a silly practice of which participating universities should be ashamed.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

BATTLE Over Booze

Changing legal drinking age would take away appeal of breaking law

We live in a country that prides itself on being free as well as offering liberty and justice for all.

However, some people might not feel they have as much freedom as they deserve, like the freedom to drink legally at a younger age.

The legal drinking age in Kansas is 21, but it should be lowered to 18.

I am over 21, so I have a different perspective on the subject than an 18-year-old might. For those of you under 21, I sympathize with you. I very much enjoy the idea that I can have bottles of Bud Light, Schmirnoff, Captain Morgan and Jack Daniels in my fridge if I so choose.

I am now living the life every 18-year-old cannot seem to wait for.

Most people at the age of 18 are freshmen in college. This means they have graduated from high school. This life-defining moment brings an added maturity, and allows people to be responsible for themselves.

According to www.adoption.com, you can be 18 and legally adopt a child. You can become responsible for another person at the age of 18, but you can't legally drink alcohol.

What sense does that make? You can be legitimately accountable for another human life, but you are still not responsible enough to take care of yourself?

Going to war to fight for one's country is also an option at the age of 18.

You're risking your life, with the possibility of losing it, yet you cannot enjoy a beer with your legal-aged buddies.

Can someone please explain this logic to me?

Another great privilege attained at 18 is the right to vote for the leadership of our country.

I realize drinking is something not to be taken lightly. Drinking requires large amounts of maturity. If it's not done responsibly, it can have huge consequences.

Part of the appeal to underage drinking is the fact you're not supposed to be doing it. I'm sure many of us have had times in our lives where we've all done something we weren't supposed to, mainly because we weren't supposed to.

It's all part of the appeal. That's why underage drinking is such a big deal in our country — because so many people make it seem that way.

If we'd put less stress on underage drinking, it no longer would be such a temptation to minors. If we stop saying, "No you can't," and not pay as much attention to the subject, it is going to lose its allure.

How many minors drink just because they think they have to?

Peer pressure can play a huge part in underage drinking. Parents tell you not to drink and the law tells you not to drink, but friends and other peers tell you it's the thing to do.

I'm not saying people wouldn't drink. I'm just saying it wouldn't seem like such a big deal, and perhaps it would lose its luster.

Most people at the age of 18 are capable of understanding those consequences and can handle themselves in a manner that will prove maturity and accountability. Problems with drinking can occur at any age, so lowering the legal drinking age to 18 isn't going to create more problems.

Some people think "18" and imagine immaturity. I think "18" and it brings to mind some of the most intelligent, mature individuals I could ever want, as well as hope, to meet.

And wisdom, maturity and age don't necessarily go hand in hand.

Lowering drinking age dangerous for all citizens, not just those of age

Lowering the Kansas drinking age to 18 seems an appealing action to the youth eagerly crossing off the days until they're 21.

There are numerous reasons this is a bad idea, the least being an even more crowded Rusty's Last Chance.

We all have our opinions about alcohol, its use and abuse. Most drinkers, legal or not, seem to classify themselves as social drinkers capable of controlling the effects of libations.

Let's ignore public opinion for a moment and address some sobering data concerning teenagers and drinking.

According to www.MADD.org, youth who begin to drink before the age of 15 are four times more likely to develop alcohol dependence than those who start at age 21.

About a third of teens responding to an American Academy of Pediatrics survey were misinformed about the potency of certain spirits. They assumed a 12-ounce can of beer contains less alcohol than a standard shot of distilled alcohol.

They assumed wrong.

Students who attend high schools with high rates of heavy drinking also experienced a greater number of side effects, including a disruption of sleep or study, property damage and verbal, physical or sexual violence.

It's safe to assume that lowering the drinking age to 18 would not make these statistics disappear.

Some might argue that underage drinking already exists, so why not make it legal? If teens are going to acquire alcohol, why not allow them to do so in a legitimate manner?

There is an enormous factor missing from such thought: these 18-year-olds are not the only ones effected by their ability to drink, lawfully or otherwise.

As with any decision a person makes in his life, others are affected by the outcome. Teenagers who decide to drink affect others in a sometimes fatal fashion.

One obvious fatal decision made by an inebriated individual is the decision to drive. An estimated 30 percent of 15-to-20-year olds killed in motor vehicle crashes in 2000 had been drinking.

Nearly 21 percent were intoxicated. It is true drunk drivers come in all ages, but the history of teen fatalities is alarming.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s a number of states actually lowered their legal drinking age to 18. Soon after, many of these states documented a surge in highway deaths, especially among teenage drivers.

There was a movement in the 1980s to reinstate 21 as the legal drinking age. Those states deciding to follow the movement noted a considerable drop in highway fatalities — as much as 28 percent less.

In 1982, the states where the minimum drinking age was 18 had approximately 55 percent of fatal car crashes involving youth, also involving alcohol.

Since the age minimum was reinstated nationwide at 21, alcohol-related fatalities among youth has been cut in half. Mothers Against Drunk Driving estimates more than 17,000 lives have been saved.

So, historically, this theory that teenagers can handle alcohol has been proven false. But why is 21 the magical drinking number?

According to Buzzed, a book containing facts about alcohol abuse, biology plays an enormous role.

The human brain does not finish developing until about the age of 20.

One of the last regions of the brain to mature is involved with the ability to plan and make complex judgments.

It's ridiculous and dangerous to assume an immature mind can handle all the hazards that come with alcohol abuse.

I think if President Bush and Paul White were to fight, Paul White would win.

I'm tired of political comments in the Fourum.

If KSU football players don't get paid, then when did that policy change? A few unnamed players used to talk about picking up their weekly checks.

Man, it's cold on the way to my 7:30 chemistry class. Not really the temperature — I just see way too many sorority girls.

Hey Paul White, if you don't like America, just do us a favor and leave.

How ironic, Paul White has a self portrait in today's Collegian: the guy with his head up his butt.

Three weeks missing work to go to Scotland — $103. Tuition and expenses for summer classes in Scotland — $3,000. Getting kicked out of program while in Scotland and having to fend for myself for two weeks — priceless.

Collegian — due to budget cutbacks you will now have to replace the cartoons with advertisements. Thank you.

After missing class today, I have come to one conclusion — I'm a big time loser. I need to drop out of school and become a trash man. I even get told I look like a trash man.

What's the big deal about Friday the 13th? It's no more rare than any other day. You can't have Friday the 13th without Thursday the 12th or Wednesday the 11th and so on.

Why do girls go for loser

TO THE EDITOR

Response to Lou Douglas lecture positive; coverage fails to note several critical points in Sister Prejean's speech

Editor,

As a member of the Lou Douglas Committee that brought Sister Prejean to campus, I was delighted to see the overwhelming response from attendees, and the Collegian coverage Sept. 9 and 10, before and after the event.

Encouraging attendance and name recognition where students might not be quite as familiar in advance is a tradition that has been important for K-State's educational mission.

While I was pleased the coverage captured the feisty, entertaining quality of the speaker, I was very disappointed and dismayed that the speaker's powerful, substantive points opposing the death penalty weren't mentioned.

While focusing on Prejean's commendable desire for her audience to think for themselves, the Sept. 10 article failed to note such key points as the social injustice of a judicial system whose dice are loaded against the poor, her withering portrayal of those who quote the Bible to defend the death penalty, the illogic of the "deterrent" argument, the often ignored point that victims' families and law enforcers are hardly united behind the death penalty, that one can oppose the death penalty without being weak on crime and that even many of the supporters of the death penalty are calling for moratoria until the system is made more fair and reliable — this latter a petition that many K-Staters signed at the talk.

Avoiding the actual politics of issues can quickly become a form of journalistic self-censorship that assumes in advance readers just want to be entertained with a "human interest" story, hardly worthy of Sister Prejean's work.

POMEROY RETURNS

Searching for identity

Rap-rock hybrid plays hometown tonight

Touring cross-country

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When the members of Pomeroy toured the West Coast this summer, they left part of their band behind.

The band's RV, "The Lumi," broke down for the fourth, and possibly final time, in Seattle, where the vehicle is resting. But the band is still on the road and playing.

Tonight, that road brings them back to the town where they got their start. Pomeroy will play for its hometown crowd with opening band, Anything but Joey, at Silverado Saloon.

Pomeroy's tour schedule has maintained a hectic pace since the band released "Cocoon Club" in October. The album featured the single, "Droppin'," a fan favorite that also was featured on the Local Music Show's "Radio Rage" compilation album in November 2000.

Since the release of "Cocoon Club," the album has sold more than 8,000 copies, a swift success compared to Pomeroy's first EP, "Inside the Shine," which sold 6,000 copies from April 1999 until it ran out of print in April 2001. Guitarist and vocalist David Fairbanks said the response from fans has been good, and he expects the album to continue to sell with additional touring.

"We haven't been able to take it to all the places we want to yet," Fairbanks said. "There are still towns we've played pretty regularly in the past that haven't heard us do the songs off that album."

Despite the album's success, the members of the band are not fully satisfied with their work. Fairbanks said he and the rest of Pomeroy consider "Cocoon Club" to be the first step in a metamorphosis of their style. He said they still have some work to do before they get to the sound they are searching for.

"It's definitely a building record," Fairbanks said. "We're not happy with all the parts of it."

The band takes full responsibility for its disappointment with "Cocoon Club." Matt Maron, guitar and vocals, attributes the weaknesses of the album to a feeling that they didn't approach the project with the right attitude.

"We were kind of unprepared when we went into the studio and we took too long," Maron said. "Our main goal was to capture the energy of a live performance. It was almost there, but the recording process was tough, and we were pretty tired by the time we were halfway through."

Pomeroy eased away from its constant performances last month to write new material. The band intends to have five songs ready to record in December for a new EP.

Maron said the band members are optimistic about the project and the course they are taking with their music. Maron said the songs they are writing now are some of the best they've ever written.

"The song structures are a lot more thought out, and the performance has definitely improved with all the practices and shows we've done," he said.

The title of the EP, "Identity," comes from the featured title track, but it also has become rallying cry for the band. Maron said Pomeroy's music hasn't been truly represented on earlier recordings, and now they are striving to create the sound they feel they are capable of.

"We want something that will say, 'This is Pomeroy. This is what we sound like. This is our identity,'" Maron said.

Pomeroy has moved its base of operations from Omaha, Neb. to Kansas City, Mo., but the band hasn't faltered in its relentless campaign of live shows. After returning from the West, Pomeroy stayed closer to home, playing in midwest towns such as St. Louis, Chicago and Stillwater, Okla.

Pomeroy's summer touring schedule has taken them all over. The band played Omaha's "Sweetstock" music festival in August, which was headlined by Nelly and the St. Lunatics, and played "Rock-fest" where they appeared alongside Filter and Sevendust.

Members were disappointed

Concerts arrive in Thailand

Sixteen years after its first hit, the British duo Pet Shop Boys has finally arrived in Thailand.

Last month's concert was a rare opportunity for thousands of Thais to see Western pop stars they know only through recorded music piped into the country from distant shores by radio and CDs.

But more Western acts are expected to perform as the local concert industry, which collapsed during the 1997-98 financial crisis, enjoys a renaissance and as Thai consumers start spending more.

Ticket prices vary, but even the most expensive seats have filled up at recent shows, including last month's performance by jazz pianist Diana Krall.

Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra raises prices

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and its musicians have agreed to a new two-year contract.

The contract, ratified last week, is retroactive to Sept. 2, and runs through Sept. 5, 2004. It will increase the orchestra's costs by an annual average of 2.4 percent.

Symphony management and the musicians' union agreed that the length of the contract is appropriate because it allows reassessment in two years of the changing economy, which has caused financial problems for other urban orchestras.

Under the new deal, a musician's minimum weekly salary stays at $1,675 in the first year. Each musician will receive a one-time payment of $1,000 in March 2003.

The minimum weekly scale will increase $25 per week in the first half of the 2003-04 year, and then go up another $25 in the second half.

Football addict explains obsession

Sleep deprivation among symptoms

We need to promote understanding in this world — in Israel, in classes and between football fans and non-football fans.

In that light, I speak for the football fans.

There is a problem when all you accomplish on a given weekend is to watch football games and set an NFL fantasy football lineup.

Such was the case last weekend.

I did little academically until Sunday night. But, man, I enjoyed it.

That is what football season truly does. It shrinks GPAs.

See, I am addicted to football.

Addicts watch the pregame, game and post-game show, along with the 10 p.m. late edition of SportsCenter. We deal with the late nights, little sleep and working from behind to catch up on things. When the homework is done, I watch the 1 a.m. SportsCenter.

Sure, sleep deprivation is an inconvenience, but you learn to live with it.

Football addicts know the real sufferers are non-football fans or casual fans, who like to watch one game a week and then maybe the Super Bowl.

They must truly hate this time of year. They go through summer and everything is normal. Baseball plays on. Couples court in the park, take trips to museums and spend mornings plotting out their Sunday afternoons.

Then late in August, something strange happens. The air gets a little crisper and the temperature drops. Football teams wind down their preseason and the real games start. Football fans abandon all other activities.

The walks in the park cease to exist on Sunday. The drives get shorter and revolve around a gridiron.

All action points to the field. People stop to watch football. It looks like nothing but 11 guys trying to beat the other 11 guys on paper, but it is more than that.

Not to be sexist or anything, but predominately men are bigger football fans than women. Some women enjoy the games, but others feel betrayed by the pigskin.

My girlfriend is a lot like this. She enjoys the game in moderation, and will watch about a game per week. Her Sundays are a lot more useful. She gets to sleep earlier and doesn't quite understand the passion behind the NFL.

She can't fathom why each game is pivotal, why I cannot afford to miss anything. For us, days pass by in quarter-long increments, and it never seems to end. A snap count quickly turns into the next great play — plays football fans spend the next week analyzing.

Still, this column is not about apologizing. It's about a natural love for football. I know no other way to do things. Sometimes life is just that way.

Instead, this column is about understanding. This is about bridging two groups of people, the football addicts and the casual fans.

On behalf of football junkies everywhere, let us say thanks to the non-football fans, girlfriends and wives out there who endure the football season, and its yelling. For those of you out there who feel betrayed by the pigskin, thanks for your patience. The season ends in January. Your long walks can continue then.

Familiar name overtakes field in Topeka; Mortimer rests

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Once again, Mathew Chesang finished at the front of the pack.

The sophomore edged Kansas' Chris Jones by two seconds in Saturday's K-State Invitational 6,400 meter race, capturing first place.

Chesang's efforts, along with a fourth place finish by teammate Drew Tonniges, helped the K-State men's cross country team grab second place, finishing just seven team points behind the Jayhawks.

"Mathew went out and established a really good pace," Coach Randy Cole said. "He's working well, all our guys are. We need to see a little more improvements from our fourth and fifth runners."

In his first race of the season, freshman Rodgers Kipchumba finished in fifth place, nine seconds behind Tonniges.

Kipchumba is a little behind the training curve, Cole said. He lost two weeks due to difficulty in getting a student visa to come to the United States from Kenya.

"He's going to be a lot better than that," Cole said. "We've had him on pretty much just distance runs, but he's getting into a regular flow of training. He ran that race on good aerobics so that was encouraging."

On the women's side, Trisha Culbertson and Erin Mortimer picked up the slack, as All-American Amy Mortimer and junior Cate Holston withdrew because of injuries.

Cole said Amy had a calf tighten up just prior to the race and Holston was nursing some back stiffness.

He said he decided not to risk any further injuries and pull them out of the competition.

"It wasn't worth it at this point in the season," Cole said. "The others responded well though, and if everyone's healthy we win that race."

Culbertson finished second with a time of 12:46. Mortimer was just 10 seconds behind, claiming third place. Shauna Burrell also pulled down a top 10 finish, crossing the line in

Big 12 | Newman named Defensive Player of the Week

After earning Big 12 Conference special teams player of the week honors for his performance against Louisiana-Monroe, K-State's Terence Newman collected his second award in as many weeks Monday, being selected as the SBC Big 12 Conference defensive player of the week for his performance against Eastern Illinois on Saturday.

Newman, who has already scored touchdowns on both a punt and a kickoff return as well as from scrimmage as a wide receiver, recorded six tackles, including four solo stops and a tackle for loss to spark the Wildcat defense in a 63-13 victory over Eastern Illinois.

With the help of Newman, who

NCAA | K-State women's basketball pre-ranked No. 3 again

The K-State women's basketball team received its second preseason ranking of the 2002-03 season by being ranked No. 3 by Athlon Sports in its Women's Preseason Top 25 Poll in its just-released College Basketball edition. In addition, junior Nicole Ohlde and sophomore Kendra Wecker earned preseason All-America honors.

Athlon named Ohlde an All-America candidate to its All-America second team and Wecker to its third team. Kansas State was one of only two schools (Tennessee-Gwen Jackson, second team and Kara Larson, third team) to have a pair named to any of the three all-America teams. Ohlde and Wecker were also two of three student-athletes from the Big 12 (Lindsay Wilson, Iowa State).

The honors were the second preseason accolades for the pair as Womenscollegehoops.com named Ohlde an honorable mention All-American and Wecker a second team All-American this summer.

K-State was ranked No. 3 by SLAM Magazine earlier this month and prior to that ranking the Wildcats had not been acknowledged in the preseason by a national organization since K-State was ranked No. 9 in the 1984 Associated Press Women's Preseason Poll.

BY THE NUMBERS

Golf teams underway at respective events

Wildcat men bounce back, tie for 6th after 2 rounds

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State men's golf team is tied for sixth place after the first two rounds of play at the Inverness Invitational in Toledo, Ohio.

After the team shot a 304 in the first round Monday morning, the Cats played much better in the afternoon, carding a 294 in the second round, eight shots off the lead.

"We're in good position as a team," Coach Tim Norris said. "It wasn't a career day, but we did a good job of hanging in there. Obviously we got closer to the leaders."

"We were 16 strokes out of the lead starting the afternoon," Norris said. "To cut that to eight was excellent."

Leading the Wildcats was junior Greg Douglas, who shot two more than par on each of the first two rounds to finish the day four strokes over par.

The Inverness Club is one of the toughest courses K-State will see this season, Norris said. The club has been host to several United States Golf Association championships.

Norris said he liked the way his players responded after struggling on a tough stretch of the course.

"The best thing was we finished the round," he said. "That's a tough, tough course. There was a stretch on the front nine that was very difficult. The guys put it behind them and finished strong."

The 15-team field in Toledo also offered a tough challenge for the Wildcats.

"Golf World Magazine said that six of the top 25 teams in the country are at this tournament," Norris said. "Our goal coming in was not to win, but to just play well."

Juniors Aaron Watkins and A. J. Elgert finished the day at 5-over par 149 and 6-over par 150 respectively.

Elgert struggled in the first round, shooting a 7-over par 79, but came back in the second round with a one-under-par 71.

K-State continues play tomorrow, with the final round beginning at 9 a.m.

Women's team 8 strokes back of tournament leaders' pace

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State needed a strong second round on Monday to make a push for the lead at the Chip-N-Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb.

The Wildcats shot a 311 in the first round but cut seven strokes off its score in the second round, shooting a 304.

Junior Christine Boucher is tied for fourth place after shooting a three-over-par 75 in the first round. Boucher then led K-State's push in the second round, finishing with a even-par 72.

Coach Kristi Knight said she was happy with the team's performance on the first day, but there still are some things they need to work on.

"Christine played very solid," Knight said. "Karen (Quintelier) had a nice day. Everybody did something good at some point in the day."

"We still feel like we threw away some shots," she said. "We made too many double-bogeys. We've got to get rid of the doubles. If we do that, we're in first place. We need to work on keeping our mistakes to bogey, not double or triple."

In third place, K-State's 615 trails only Colorado State's team score of 607 and Iowa State's team score of 608.

Senior Miranda Smith struggled with back pain in the first round, shooting a 13-over par 85, but bounced back with a 76 in the second round.

"Miranda got off to a tough start," Knight said. "Her back was sore and she missed some shots badly. She put them in bad spots. She knew she had to step it up in the second round."

"We can win this thing," she said.

"Obviously, we did better in the second round than we did in the first round. You can't win on the first day, but you can lose on the first day."

The field concludes play at 8 a.m. today with the final round.

exceptions, but you can't go the other way with it."

Nel's attendance policies are based on the types of classes he teaches.

"It comes from teaching required classes," he said. "People are in classes they do not necessarily want to be in, but I think it is to their advantage to attend."

It would be very hard for a student to succeed without attending classes, Nel said.

"My classes depend on discussion and interaction," Nel said. "It is hard to have class when students do not show up."

It is difficult to understand why some students choose not to come to classes, Nel said.

"Well, it's kind of ridiculous," he said.

"A student pays all this money to go to college, and then they don't show up to classes."

But for Dvorak, going to class is a personal decision. He said he is motivated to go to class because he wants to pass, not because of an attendance policy imposed by one of his professors.

"If I am going to skip, I would skip a lecture-type class rather than a discussion-based class," Dvorak said.

"In smaller classes, you are easily missed. But lecture classes are usually so big that no one notices."

Nel said he has found his attendance policies ensure that most of his students show up in class.

Although he is in favor of attendance policies in general, Nel is not sure a mandatory attendance policy would work at K-State.

"With a policy like this, you would definitely want to have the support of most of the faculty before you even considered it," Nel said. "This campus has a lot of different styles and types of classes, and whether or not something like that could work for the entire university, well, I'm just not sure."

Sabri and Arab League chief Amr Moussa met with Annan to transmit the letter.

"I'm now passing the letter to the Security Council and they will have to decide what they do next and of course Mr. Blix and his team will be ready to continue their work," Annan said.

He wouldn't answer any questions from reporters but his office was preparing to release the text of the letter. Under Security Council resolutions, sanctions imposed on Iraq after its 1990 invasion of Kuwait cannot be lifted until U.N. inspectors certify its weapons of mass destruction are destroyed. Inspectors left the country in 1998 ahead of U.S. and British airstrikes to punish Iraq for not cooperating with inspections.

Since then, Iraq has refused to allow inspectors to return, and the stalemate had split the United States, Britain, Russian, France and China — the five powerful members of the U.N. Security Council.

The turnabout in Iraq, after four years of stalemate, came days after President Bush addressed the U.N. General Assembly debate and said that Iraq must comply with Security Council resolutions or face the consequences.

Top Bush aides huddled after Annan's announcement, preparing a response. Annan said the Arab League had played a key role in bringing about the Iraqi response.

But the women didn't have their normal depth, and with KU taking five of the top 10 places, the Jayhawks cruised to a first place finish.

"If we line up best against best we win by 15 points," Cole said. "But you have to be ready in case something like this happens."

Runners also had to deal with different conditions that could have been controlled.

Cole said marshals for the event flagged both the men's and women's races in the wrong direction. The men ran nearly a half mile more, he said, while the women's race differed close to 300 meters.

This can drastically alter the mentality of a runner, he said.

"It was embarrassing that this happened because we have our name on this event and we couldn't help what happened," Cole said. "We had guys leading, then they fell back and had to rescrumble."

"Next time I might as well bring kids from our track team to marshal the race."

Although the Cats ran at the same course as last week, the competition was much better, Cole said, allowing runners a competitive mentality.

"This was a regular meet format," Cole said. "It was more exciting and more challenging — everyone was out there duking it out."

They have nearly two weeks off to prepare for a trip to Minnesota, where they will face 35 of the best teams in the nation. That will be the first true test for K-State, Cole said.

"That's when we throw them into the frying pan and see how we do," he said.

Career Fair connects ambitious students with needy employers

2-day project helps job seekers put name out

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Two hundred thirty-eight employers will be scouting K-State students Sept. 24 and 25.

At the All-University Career Fair, students have the opportunity to meet with potential employers for either full-time work or internship positions.

Sponsored by Career and Employment Services, the fair will be at Bramlage Coliseum and will take place during a two-day period, giving everyone from freshmen to graduate students the opportunity to meet with employers.

Employer booths will be set up in Bramlage from noon to 5 p.m. each day of the fair. Students are invited to come and visit with employers and possibly gain on-campus interviews for the next day.

Brenda Schoendaller, Career Fair project manager, said students can come to the fair with the intention to gain employment, but the fair also is effective in networking and getting students' names out there.

"It is the gateway to recruiting," she said. "Anyone, even graduate students, can come and look for any type of employment."

Schoendaller said the fair is in its ninth year as an all-university event, but CES has helped various colleges have career fairs as well.

and industry, said the Career Fair is beneficial because students can scope out the employment possibilities available to them.

She said this year's Career Fair might be different from ones in the past because of the recession.

"Students may have to look for more internships than jobs this year," she said. "Some employers may not be hiring, but it is still an opportunity to get their names out. Students should attend the Career Fair with that in mind."

Young said she would advise students to present themselves in a professional manner at the fair and to have plenty of résumés available to hand out.

"Students need to have their résumés perfected as much as they can," she said. "Practicing interview skills and dressing nicely is also important. Students need to have the attitude that they are an asset to the employer."

Young said the Career Fair can be beneficial to all students, but they have to get out there and participate.

"It offers students a chance to see what's out there," she said. "It is rewarding to see students go out there and see what is available in their majors. A lot of people don't know what they can do. It is exciting to be involved with this."

Good interview etiquette essential to landing perfect job

Practicing approach helps to improve skills, confidence

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The interview is the single most important aspect of a successful job search, according to the Career and Employment Services interview guide.

CES, in Holtz Hall, helps students perfect their interviewing skills.

Jessica Heller, a graduate student in family studies and human services, works at CES.

She said confidence is the key to successful interviews.

To help students gain skills needed for the interviewing process, CES provides mock interviews, which help students get familiar with the interviewing process.

"It benefited me by being able to talk one-on-one with an industry employer and at the same time having the interviewer tell me what they were looking for," Heller said.

Heller said it's important to research the employer before going into the interview.

"If the student takes time to get to know the employer, they seem more knowledgeable," Heller said.

Heller also said it's important to dress appropriately.

According to the interview guide, men should wear a conservative two-piece suit, white dress shirt and simple silk tie. For women, a conservative suit or dress is recommended.

Katie Remsburg, junior in elementary education, has attended four etiquette courses, two of which specialized in interviewing techniques.

She said the courses were required for the student ambassadors at her former school, Butler County Community College.

Now that she has transferred, Remsburg said two key interviewing tips have stayed with her: always to maintain eye contact and never to giggle.

"I giggle a lot, and it makes you look nervous if you giggle," Remsburg said.

Remsberg said she also was told that when an employer asked a question, if she didn't know the response right away to take time for herself and not to say "uh."

"I'd say, 'that's a very good question. Let me think about that for a moment,'" Remsburg said.

Heller said another important factor in the interviewing process is how a student sits during the interview.

"You should have good posture, and sit up straight. Being a little on the edge of the chair makes you seem more involved in the interview as well as conveying an interest in the job," she said.

Heller also said the interviewee should gauge the employer to make sure he or she still is paying attention.

For example, if the employer looks bored, the interviewee should shorten his or her responses.

"Responses should be complete and concise," she said.

Heller said that if students are not confident with their interviewing techniques, they should go to CES and bring résumés to be critiqued.

"Since you only get to spend 30 minutes with the employer, anything you can do to stick out so the employer remembers you is a good thing," Heller said.

Professional résumé key to good interview

Accurate, concise content important for job candidates

By Shannon Hartenstein
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A college diploma isn't the only piece of paper that matters in the job market.

A good résumé could be the first step in obtaining a career after college.

A good résumé should sell the job candidate, said Mary Ellen Barkley, Career and Employment Services coordinator.

"I think they provide the employer a quick summary of your experience," she said.

Matt Wolters, senior in agricultural economics, has been teaching students in the University Experience class about the importance of a good résumé.

"The résumé is important to get the interview," he said. "You have to have a résumé that shows your experience, as well as looks good."

Résumés can vary in length, design and content, Barkley said. Most undergraduates can get by with a one-page résumé, but it's acceptable if a student has enough experience to warrant a second page, she said.

Less is more when it comes to most résumé designs, Barkley said. Bold headings, lines and white space make résumés look professional and easy to read, she said.

"In some disciplines, it's more appropriate to have more creativity, such as in graphic design fields," she said.

"In general, we tend to be more conservative. You have to consider the circumstances."

Barkley recommends choosing a plain color of paper, such as ivory, gray or white.

Some textured papers work well, but she said students should avoid using too much texture, since it can make it difficult to read.

Students can print a few copies and have others look at it to decide if the paper type is right, she said.

Barkley also recommends

Basic elements of a résumé

Contact Information

Students should include their names, addresses, e-mail addresses and phone numbers. Avoid using e-mail addresses that are too personal. Students should stick to their K-State e-mail addresses.

Objective statement

A short, basic objective statement should tell the employer exactly what type of position is desired rather than what the students hope to gain or learn.

Education

Students should state the degree they're pursuing, anticipated graduation date, grade point average and major, if it's distinct from the degree title.

Experience

Outline past experience with short, very specific statements that start with action verbs.

Others

Activities, awards, honors, leadership and additional skills also can be included.

Source: Mary Ellen Barkley, Career and Employment Services coordinator

printing résumés with a laser printer for the best quality.

The résumé's content should be concise, well-written and balanced to avoid crowding information on the page, she said. Subject headings should be clear and easy to read.

"The idea is to show you're actually taking part in doing something rather than being a passive participant," she said. "The more detail you can include — the specific number of people you worked with, equipment, dollar amounts — gives the reader a better picture of what you've done."

Students also should take the time to ensure résumés are free of spelling mistakes and grammatical errors, she said.

"Even something small, like having a misspelling on a résumé, can keep you from getting an interview," Barkley said. "If you're in a very competitive industry, they have to have some way of eliminating people."

For more information, students can attend a résumé-critique workshop at 3:30 p.m. Thursday in Holtz Hall.

Career and Employment Services also offers individual advising. Call 532-6506 to make an appointment.

Internships help boost job market value

Work experience provides some students more to offer employers

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Breaking into the job market is not always easy.

In order to be more competitive in the job market, some students have taken part in internships.

Rachel Heine, senior in hotel and restaurant management, spent her summer interning for the International Association of Administrative Professionals.

Heine said she learned a lot from her internship and that it was an all-around good experience.

Heine found her internship by following up on an e-mail that was sent to students in her department, she said.

Aside from these types of e-mails, there are other ways for students to find internships.

Kerri Day Keller, associate director of Career Employment Services, said K-State offers several ways to help students find internships.

"Career Employment Services offers online job listings, a place for students to post their résumés, as well as events like the Career Fair," Keller said.

"These are good places to find internships."

Some areas of study require students to complete an internship in order to graduate.

This is the case for social work majors, said Kim Morgan, adviser in the Department of Sociology, Anthropology and Social Work.

Morgan said students generally find internship experiences to be very valuable.

"Students seem to enjoy to see how everything comes together and to learn how to apply schoolwork to the real world," Morgan said.

David Pacey, an adviser in the Department of Mechanical and Nuclear Engineering, said internships are not required for the mechanical engineering program but are encouraged.

Pacey also said students often received jobs from the companies for which they interned.

He noted the change professors see in students who have completed an internship.

"A lot of students intern to help with their careers," Pacey said. "But often they make better students."

Pacey said engineering internships are almost always paid internships.

This is not true for all internships, Keller said.

She said payment often depends on the organization and how much money it has.

Keller said students should make the decision of whether to take an unpaid internship or to work a part-time job based on their personal needs.

Eric Matzke, senior in information systems, found his work experience to be very valuable.

Matzke completed an internship this past summer in an information management leadership program.

"I'm more ready for the real world now," Matzke said.

Web site allows students to search online

Latest technology enables job-seekers to surf for internships, career opportunities

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In a poor job market, students have to use every resource available to find jobs, including the Internet.

Career and Employment Services, located in Holtz Hall, enables students to search for jobs online.

The CES Web site, www.ksu.edu/ces, lists available part-time and full-time jobs, internships and summer jobs.

Students can post résumés online, sign up for on-campus interviews and sort employer lists by major or location.

The Web site also has links to other job search engines, job information sites and newspaper Web sites across the country.

Appointments

To view a list of part-time and full-time jobs and internships go to www.ksu.edu/ces.

Employers post listings on the Web site and can view students' résumés, sorting by major.

Kelly Merkel, senior in food science and agribusiness, has used the CES Web site ever since coming to K-State.

"I've used their services to find internships and gain interview experience," Merkel said.

"This semester, I'll be looking for a full-time job and can utilize some of the connections I've made."

Students and alumni can use the Web site by registering with CES.

The $30 registration fee, payable through KATS or by an office visit, allows students unlimited access to lists of employers.

More than 3,000 students registered with CES last year, said Mary Ellen Barkley, coordinator at Career and Employment Services.

Barkley said she wasn't surprised at that number.

"We've worked really hard to tailor our links to students' needs in each academic area," Barkley said.

"It is a very helpful site specific to K-State students — whether you're looking at full-time jobs or internships."

Registered students can choose among the 479 jobs and 151 internships listed on the Web site.

The Auburn-Washburn Unified School District 437, Topeka, Kan., is just one of the employers that utilizes the site.

"It's absolutely effective," Martin Weishaar, communications coordinator for USD 437, said.

"We can continually update information and access student information from virtually anywhere. From an organizational standpoint, it is far better than your run-of-the-mill job search."

Barkley said students can temporarily preview the Web site by visiting the guest browse option on the home page.

"Students can get a free preview of the Web site's resources," Barkley said.

"It's a great opportunity to use a restricted system to view employers' Web sites or for research."

Barkley said she encourages students to use the Web site as a starting point.

"There are many pieces to a job search," she said.

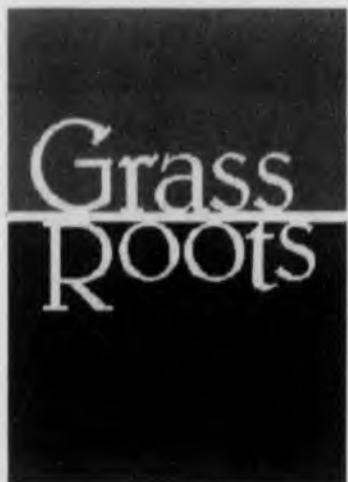

"The Internet can be effective, but not as the only search tool."

"Students can identify what company they want to work with, but they may have to call the company or set up an interview time."

Merkel said she agreed with Barkley.

"CES has a wealth of resources and has helped me make a lot of contacts," Merkel said.

"It does a good job of providing a base, but it isn't the only place to look."

Qualities learned in college transfer over to workplace

Time management, good communication essential aspects of future employment

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Going through the motions of college life can get students stuck in a rut. Studying, testing and attending class become habits.

But Judy Lynch, director of the Academic Assistance Center, said nearly every quality that is required to be a successful student is directly transferable to the workplace, so it is important to develop and maintain good work habits.

Lynch said time management, good communication and knowing how to work with others are skills that are important to hone in college because they will be essential in careers.

Time management involves using a planner, prioritizing and focusing on the task at hand. She said employers expect this from college students, and those who manage time the best are most likely to be successful.

Cooperation, sharing ideas and respecting others' ideas all are important aspects of getting along with others in the workplace, she said.

Lynch said expository writing and public speaking are required courses for every student at K-State because the university realizes how important good communication skills are. She said employers can assess communication skills through résumés and during interviews.

Kerri Day Keller, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said having a goal is important in both school and professional fields.

"Everyone has a different style," Keller said, "but being result-oriented is important and will carry over to the work field."

Keller also said students should have a desire to learn because employers want their employees to continue learning after graduation.

"By no means are you done learning when you get your degree," she said.

Qualities

Virtually every quality that is required to be a successful student is directly transferable into the workplace. This includes:

- Managing time effectively
- Using a planner
- Setting and accomplishing goals
- Meeting deadlines
- Being self-disciplined
- Focusing on and completing tasks
- Following directions
- Taking personal responsibility
- Regular attendance and being on time
- Being adequately prepared for class
- Doing quality work at all times
- Thinking critically
- Asking effective questions
- Cooperating with others
- Communicating effectively (in both oral and written forms)
- Respecting diverse opinions
- Valuing diversity
- Practicing ethical behavior

Source: Judy Lynch, director, the Academic Assistance Center

"Employers want to see potential to continue learning."

Keller said simply showing up to class isn't good enough.

"It's not just going and doing your job or going to class," she said, "but to make the most of that experience and take the extra initiative is what sets you apart."

Michelle Haupt, coordinator of the Academic and Career Information Center, said it is important for everyone — students and those in the workforce — not to get stuck in the day-to-day drudgery.

"A student should be open and willing to reassess the situation and change if necessary," she said. "You have to have the courage to change."

Part-time jobs have positive and negative aspects

Students balance school, work to gain experience

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Get a job.

Although many students work, some officials say there are negative consequences that go along with the positives of having a job.

Kerri Day Keller, associate director of Career and Employment Services, said part-time jobs can be beneficial for students. She said, however, that when students work more than 20 hours per week, it can have a negative effect.

"At a certain extent, studies have shown that working too much can begin to negatively affect academic performance," she said.

Keller said that in Manhattan, job-seeking students outnumber the part-time jobs available. She said, for example, that the Part-time Job Expo 2002 in August attracted 1,300 students and 27 employers.

"It just shows that we have a lot of students looking for jobs," she said. "But there are some opportunities in Manhattan."

Even working in service-related jobs is beneficial to students' job-skills development, Keller said.

"These types of jobs offer students a chance to develop customer skills, work ethic and an idea of how people approach work," she said.

She said work experience can be later documented and be marketed on résumés. Keller said she suggests students use part-time job experience as a stepping stone to job-related internships.

"I think what employers are looking for from students is a balance between academics and grades," Keller said. "Low grades resulting from students working too much won't help."

Krishna Stewart, senior in park resource management, works as a lab monitor in the Language Learning Center in Eisenhower Hall. She said she works there about 10 to 12 hours a week, and this is her ninth semester as a lab monitor.

Stewart said her job includes data entry, copying tapes and making sure the LLC runs smoothly. She said although her on-campus job doesn't offer much experience relating to her major, the chance to have a job she enjoys is more important.

"Nothing beats the convenience of an on-campus job," Stewart said. "You can go right to work, and I don't have to worry about uniforms or driving to an off-campus job."

April Eisenhower, sophomore in architectural engineering, cleans houses about three hours a week to earn extra spending cash. She said she came across the idea from a friend and then placed an advertisement in a newspaper.

"It's pretty much the perfect job for me, in terms of fitting in with my schedule and something I enjoy," Eisenhower said. "I need a lot of self-motivation in order to get the work done."

SUMMER SCHOOL

High school internship teaches lessons

PAUL RESTIVO

Catholicism prohibits my entrance into heaven if I opt for suicide.

This was the motivating factor in continuing my summer internship.

This summer, I taught three two-hour blocks of creative writing, newspaper and Web-page design respectively. I didn't slit my wrists, I'm not on any new medications, and I'm still pursuing my secondary education degree.

Those are reasons to believe that my Belton High School internship was successful.

But I should have taken my first five minutes in the building as an indication for what would become the longest summer of my life.

I walked in the room, turned on the lights, stepped in the door and wham! The motion detector sensed my movement and set off the master alarm that controlled the floor. After realizing I wasn't a code-breaker, I gave up on trying to disarm the system. I huffed and puffed up the stairs until I found a janitor.

"Well, you shouldn't be walking around in teachers' classrooms. You best get to class young man before your teacher counts you tardy."

And so began my relationship with the janitors. I never was respected merely because I spiked my bangs and chose to wear flip-flops, which my students called the "college-teacher footwear."

Illustration by Anna Wetzel | COLLEGIAN

I noticed a note left on my desk one day from the janitor. It read as follows:

"Chock board are for assignment only. Please do not use."

The little respect I had for the low-life janitor diminished. I realized then why I was in the classroom and why he was mopping up puke.

The students weren't much better. My smartest student wrote countless pieces of poetry. I was so proud of the young bard until one of my colleagues recognized that several of her poems were from a movie.

And so the plagiarism talks began. Images of Piper School District officials danced in my head. I knew I had to do the right thing.

So, I told her she did a good job and posted it on the wall.

Respect was a serious issue in my class. It wasn't until week four that students realized my name was neither "Mr. Rodriguez" nor "Hey, baller." Homework was placed on the backburner while neopets.com and pinchat.com became the main educational tools.

It wasn't until a student asked me why I "popped so many pills" during class that I realized I was having a nervous breakdown. Even the principal came in while I was going off on a tangent, which had originally started out as a lesson on parody writing.

"Raise your hand if you're going to slit your wrists after school" was all Mr. Gray heard before he asked to see me after class — luckily, he only wanted to discuss my pay raise.

But like most trials in my life, this internship experience offered a lesson.

The day I handed my students their portfolios and certificates of achievement was one of sheer amazement, relief and accomplishment.

The looks on the students' faces when they saw their final drafts was something I wish our class historian would have gotten on film — she was too busy filming the growing bust of her "peep" Kristin.

I learned a lot from this internship experience. I learned that teachers don't get the credit they deserve. I learned that all students can succeed regardless of what their lives might be like at home. And I learned that teachers are fighting an uphill battle every day, hoping that at the end of the year, their students are better individuals.

Mostly, I learned to appreciate the value of internships. They are crucial in deciding if you should continue to pursue your major. I'm hooked on education after that experience.

But if nothing else, I've learned that I'm still smarter than most janitors.

Students should seize benefits of Career Fair

I'm graduating in December, but I don't have a clue about what I want to do with my life. However, I'm still prepared for almost anything.

I could apply for an internship or seek a full-time position. It's all up in the air. I could live here in Manhattan — though I can say with much confidence I have no intention to — or I could move to some far-away destination where piña colodas are abundant and my overly pale skin could finally turn a nice, golden brown.

I know I'm going to have to start paying back the Mt. Everest of loan debts I've accumulated, but just when I'll have to do that is still in question. Do I consolidate, or do I just leave the damned paperwork alone?

The only thing I don't know is how — among all these other worries — I am going to function in the "real world," post-graduation.

And I know I'm not alone. This thought plagues graduating seniors like no other. It's this fear of being ripped from our cozy college life that keeps our nails short and our palms moist.

We've become accustomed to campus life, and the thought of uprooting ourselves once again is terrifying. It's like leaving home to come to college all over again, except now college is our home and the workforce awaiting us is unknown.

But we can overcome our fears.

If we plan ahead and consider all our options, there is no limit to what we can do. We have to put forth the effort, though. We're not going to get anywhere on recommendation letters alone.

If I've learned anything these past four and a half years, it's been to prepare myself for any situation. There are always chances to better myself, whether it be in school, work or relationships.

AMBER KOEHN

I've just had to learn how to spot those hidden opportunities and take advantage of them.

And you can do the same.

Marketing yourself at the K-State Career Fair will provide you with contacts and employment openings that could boost your career indefinitely. Showing up prepared for anything will thrust you past the ordinary students and place you on a pedestal where your options are limitless.

These last few months can provide you with opportunities to do things you've missed out on. They're sort of like second, third or fourth chances to get the experience necessary to propel you into the job market.

Volunteering for community organizations, joining a club or spending time job-shadowing are great learning tools that provide some experience.

You just need to follow our Latin predecessors and "carpe diem."

If you don't keep your minds open to the possibilities awaiting you, and seize the chance to make your dreams come true, you might as well pack it up right now.

You're not paying all those tuition bills for your health.

When you arrive at opportunities that can make your last days at K-State — and possibly the rest of your future — worthwhile, snatch them up quickly, even if you have to search long and hard for the perfect score.

Otherwise, those chances will disappear faster than your loan money after a bill from the cashier's office.

And there's nothing that will prepare you for that.

products for an active world.

Garmin engineers design some of the world's leading GPS navigation, communication and information devices used by pilots, hikers, bikers, boaters, fishing enthusiasts and travelers. Our company is growing, and we're looking for talented engineers to design software, electrical and mechanical components for exciting new products.

Software Application Developers: Develop exciting mapping and location-based applications for Windows, Pocket PC and Palm OS platforms. Requires a BS or MS in computer science, computer engineering or electrical engineering and application design experience using Microsoft Visual C++/MFC or Metrowerks Code Warrior.

Electrical Design Engineers (Digital/ASIC/FPGA/Analog): Design state-of-the-art consumer, marine and aviation electronics using advanced component and display technologies. Applications range from small, low-power handheld devices to high-end marine and aviation products that incorporate large color TFT panels. Requires a BS or MS in electrical engineering or computer engineering and experience designing digital, analog, display interface or power supply circuits.

Electrical Design Engineers (RF): Design RF circuits for products incorporating communication technologies such as GPS, SATCOM, CDMA, GSM/GPRS, Bluetooth, FR/GMRS, VHF/UHF and/or 802.11. Requires a BS or MS in electrical engineering with emphasis in RF circuit design. 5+ years experience in one or more of the listed areas is a major plus.

Mechanical Design Engineers: Partner closely with industrial designers to create winning product concepts and form factors. Create concept and dimensional drawings using Solidworks, AutoCad or ProE. Provide leadership during tooling and fabrication stages and see your designs go from concept to reality. Requires a BS or MS in mechanical engineering and experience using CAD tools such as Solidworks, AutoCad or ProE.

Embedded Software Developers: Design, implement and test embedded software written in C/C++ and/or assembly language running on ARM processor targets. Applications range from low-level driver design to advanced GUI presented on color LCD panels. Requires a BS or MS in computer engineering, computer science or electrical engineering. Previous experience in embedded software design, embedded GUI development, device driver development, VAP, J2ME/BREW or embedded game development is a major plus.

Technology Software Developers: Design, implement and test software technology components for GPS, weather radar, sonar, flight control or wireless protocol stacks (CDMA or GSM/GPRS). Requires a BS or MS in electrical engineering, computer engineering or computer science and 5+ years experience in one of the listed areas.

Technical Writers: Write user-friendly documentation for advanced products that enable the customer to understand rocket science on a down-to-earth level. Projects include user's guides, quick reference guides and installation and maintenance manuals. Requires a college degree or equivalent, and some projects may require specific degrees in electronics, aviation or other technical areas. Experience with Adobe InDesign, Photoshop or other equivalent desktop publishing tools is also required.

Garmin's newly expanded facility is located in a beautiful suburb of Kansas City with access to exceptional schools, affordable housing, pro sports team events and cultural entertainment. Forget traffic jams and fighting for a parking spot. Think green space, blue sky and a reverse commute. We offer a complete benefits package, an excellent 401(k) match, stock participation and lots of fun perks.

Regents names new CEO

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Kansas Board of Regents named its new CEO and president Tuesday.

Reginald L. Robinson, Chancellor at the University of Kansas, will replace Kim Wilcox, who has accepted a position as dean of liberal arts and sciences at the University of Kansas.

Robinson said that although it is impossible to make specific goals at this point, one of the important issues he will address in the next year is funding for Kansas schools.

"It'll be important over the next year and legislative session to make sure that we're really clear and informing legislative leaders about the importance of higher education in Kansas," Robinson said.

He also said there aren't a lot of resources available, but it is necessary to work to make higher education a priority.

Board Chairman Jack Wempe said that although there were four excellent candidates for this position, Robinson showed extensive leadership capabilities.

"I think the thing that impacted us the most was our judgment to his leadership ability," Wempe said. "We simply think that at this point in time that is important."

Board members also said they were impressed with Robinson's energy.

Wempe said that although Robinson's starting date is unsure, everyone is eager for him to begin.

"He's shown a pattern of leadership, and we look forward to him working with us," Wempe said.

Inspectors continue with plans

Powell skeptical about unexpected change in decision

By Charles J. Hanley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — As U.N. weapons inspectors moved ahead with plans to return to Iraq, the United States and Russia clashed on Tuesday over whether to take Baghdad at its word or impose a new ultimatum. "We have seen this game before," said a skeptical Colin Powell.

The secretary of state reaffirmed Washington's call for a tough anti-Iraq resolution by the U.N. Security Council, despite Iraq's sudden about-face on inspections.

But Russia's foreign minister said he saw no immediate need for new U.N. demands if the inspectors are quickly dispatched. He was backed by Arab leaders, Moscow's traditional allies. The "logic of war" may now be replaced by "the logic of peace," said one.

The 15-member Security Council majority decided, despite a U.S. request for more time, to quickly schedule a meeting, possibly Wednesday, with chief weapons inspector Hans Blix to discuss renewed inspections. The Americans, supported by Britain and Colombia, wanted first to prepare a new resolution, diplomats said.

KSU underbilled for water

Meter mistakes blamed again for billing error

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In what seems to be its second big oversight this year, the city of Manhattan has been underbilled K-State.

Van Zile Dining Hall has been underbilled $15,000 for water usage during the past two years.

The problem seems to be due to a meter malfunction, Bernie Hayen, director of city finance, said. The outside meter, which was not working, fed to an inside meter, which was working properly. City meter readers use the outside meters to determine water usage. This apparently caused the underbilling.

The readers reported a dead meter, but the billing procedure was not properly handled, Hayen said.

"Utility billing people ill-advisedly billed them the wrong amount," Hayen said.

Instead of billing K-State its average bill amount, a common procedure when meters are broken, the city billed Van Zile $14.94 a month, which is the minimum water bill amount. The bill should have run between $600 and $700 each month.

"Mistakes are going to occur," Hayen said. "We are aware of that possibility, but they should be caught in a reasonable amount of time. Unfortunately, 24 months is too long."

However, university officials said they are not concerned with the mistake.

"I don't believe it was a significant amount," Skyler Harper, assistant director of Housing and Dining Services, said. "The meter was broken, and the city is going to provide us with a new one to install."

In July, city officials also discovered that the water meter readings for Colbert Hills Golf Course were read incorrectly for the past three years, making the water bill significantly lower than it should have been. The city is estimating Colbert Hills was underbilled about $382,000, Hayen said.

K-State placed a six-dial meter at the golf course three years ago. However, meter readers were advised to continue reading it as a five-dial

Sophomore Honorary sleeps out to raise funds for homeless

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Marc Shaffer brought the essentials.

"A pillow and sleeping bag," said Shaffer, chairman of the Silver Key Sophomore Honorary sleepout committee. "And a Mountain Dew to keep me up a little bit later than usual."

Shaffer was one of about 30 Silver Key members who participated in Tuesday's sleepout at the K-State Student Union Plaza. The eighth annual event was designed to promote awareness about Manhattan's homeless situation and to raise money for the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

The group set its fund-raising goal at $3,000 — the highest goal set yet. Silver Key co-adviser Carla Jones said that in previous years, the group has set goals anywhere between $700 to $2,500.

"This group said they were going to go farther than that," Jones said.

Members have been planning the fund-raising event since spring and raising funds since May. Jones said that in the next few days, they will calculate the total amount raised. That money then will be presented to the emergency shelter at the Silver Key meeting Tuesday.

As part of the sleepout events, Jones read a resolution from Mayor Ed Klimek declaring the day as "Homeless Awareness Day" in Manhattan. Four Blue Key members spoke to the group about what it means to be a servant leader.

Junell Norris, executive director of the shelter, also spoke. She addressed issues the shelter faces, such as an increasing demand and lack of space.

The shelter now has about 26 beds. Norris said according to a 1999 housing study, the shelter needs to have around

SGA encourages students to register to vote

Oct. 15 marks last day for voter registration

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's just one vote. Who really cares anyway?

When it comes to voting, Sue Peterson, director of governmental relations, believes students are full of excuses for why they don't show up on election day.

"Students are a lot like adults," she said. "They feel voting takes time, and they think they're only one vote."

However, with help from the Student Governing Association, students can take their focus away from finding excuses and turn to making their voices heard with their ballot selections.

Throughout the month, SGA is assisting students with voter registration at various locations on and off campus. Students can register in the K-State Student Union, Aggieville, the residence halls, fraternities and sororities. The last day for voter registration is Oct. 15, with voting taking place Nov. 5.

"We are trying to use every available avenue to reach out to students," Emily King, chief of staff, said. "It's troubling

Student Body President Zac Cook and Amber Lafferty, sophomore in speech pathology, fill out paperwork at the voter registration table set up outside the K-State Student Union Food Court on Tuesday afternoon. Student Governing Association organized the registration and also planned on going to several student housing areas as well to promote voter registration.

BANTER AND BELLOW | Cell phones

Another way to save time, or lack of respect: students consider usefulness of convenience

Convenient, but also the devil

What has happened to our sense of time and priorities that everyone thinks he or she needs a darned cell phone? If you had a cell phone in the '80s, you lived a life that was worth being able to get a hold of on a moment's notice. You had to be a movie director, international spy or mob boss to carry one.

You had to have some serious stuff to talk about.

Now all you have to be is a snooty little snot who calls her sisters to pick her up from class, which is five blocks away from their sorority. How smooth is that? "Oh, hi sweetie, can you come and get me so I don't have to walk back to the house? You're soooo super! Veggie subs on me tonight!"

There's just no respect whatsoever.

How cool is it to see a guy and a gal out on a date, and one of them actually takes a cell phone call? You might as well say, "Hey, doll, I have to take this call, my friend lost her keys, and I have to talk her through it."

It's also real classy to see these fart-heads cruising around with their phones strapped to their belts right next to their pliers. These losers are thinking, "Since I have absolutely no chance of making it in this world, I'll carry a phone around and look at it constantly so people think I have a life."

Well listen, buddy: I'm not falling for it. Tucking your No Fear bull-riding shirt into your ironed Wranglers does not — nor will it ever — make you cool.

Have some frickin' consideration for the people around you. Yelling in your phone as you power-walk through campus or answering it in class are not ways to win friends.

It is entirely unattractive. Are the people directly around you just not worth your time?

Give them a chance. Don't be a Verizon child.

If I think about this anymore, I will rip out my hair.

My saving grace

The vague picture sometimes enters the back of my mind: I stand, forlorn, by the side of Interstate 70 next to my broken-down car. A truck stops behind me, and a man approaches. That's when safety becomes my first goal.

I don't carry pepper spray or take kickboxing classes.

But I do own a cell phone.

Because for me, there exists a worse threat than being attacked: I get lost — sweaty-palmed, high-pitched-voice, furrowed-eyebrow lost.

When I'm playing reporter, it's a given. Despite directions and detailed road maps that include trees and cracks in sidewalks, I still will lose my way when going to a story.

I'll forget which house is yours, even if I've been there five times.

My cell phone helps me prevent — or at least fix — these snafus. I might be late, but goshdarnit, I'm breathing, and I'm there.

I'll admit it — I feel the urge to giggle when I see a blonde walking around in capri pants, chatting, no doubt, about makeup and boyfriends on her cell phone.

But then, I wear capri pants. And I also walk around talking on my cell phone.

Why? Because it saves time, which is a precious commodity in these upper-class, two-job years of yore. The best time to call Mom or make an important call is when I'm making the quick stroll from class to Aggieville — literally, my home.

Indeed, I will be joining the bar society precisely at midnight tonight. How will my friends find me once this gigantic, 21-year seal in time opens and invites me in, never to return?

Just call my cell. I'll tell you which bar I'm in.

Volunteers at Ground Zero return with better appreciation for life

Students spend summer helping New York citizens recover, rebuild after Sept. 11

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A smile helped. At least Lori Jordan thought her smile helped show the people of New York that there are friendly people out there.

"It helps," she said. "It helps ease some of the pain."

When three K-State students and their sponsor headed to New York in May, that is what they set out to do - help ease some pain.

The group, including Jordan, sophomore in grain and milling science; Elizabeth Townsend, sophomore in political science; Zach Lawrence, senior in secondary education; and the Rev. Matthew Cobb traveled to New York City for a week of service to help the hungry and the homeless.

The group joined seven other students and their sponsors from around the nation to volunteer for service programs.

"We did everything from serving food to just talking with people," Jordan said, "and in the process we learned more about hunger and why we should be thankful."

The group volunteered at soup kitchens, helped with homeless coalitions and participated in some neighborhood advocacy work, Cobb said. The group also incorporated a trip to Ground Zero to experience the relief-and-recovery effort

"I think that was one of the most moving parts of the trip - to walk into this church and see every available space covered with signs, letters and stories. People all over the country had sent these to express their feelings about the attacks and to show their love for the rescue workers."

Elizabeth Townsend

firsthand.

"We visited St. Paul's Chapel," Cobb said, "which had become a place for people who were working on the recovery effort to rest. Police officers, firefighters, construction workers and rescue workers would come to this church that is right next to Ground Zero to have some quiet moments."

However, the church had much more significance than simply a resting place. Because someone had opened a window the day of the Sept. 11 attacks, the church had no major damage even though it is next door to the disaster site.

"It is an amazing story,"

Townsend said. "Not a window was broken."

"I think that was one of the most moving parts of the trip - to walk into this church and see every available space covered with signs, letters and stories. People all over the country had sent these to express their feelings about the attacks and to show their love for the rescue workers. It was a very comforting place."

And a very moving place, Jordan said.

"I couldn't relate to how much devastation these people were feeling," she said, "but it made you think. It made you think about why you are here. What is your purpose?"

For Lawrence, it was a discovery of how interconnected society is.

"It is a huge sense of community up there," he said. "They are all stuck together in one great big place, and they have to work together. They can't be isolated."

"We don't see how interconnected we are because we are not as big as a community. We don't realize what it is like to have to be directly affected by anything, whether it is poverty or a physical threat. We don't see how interconnected we are as a race and as human beings. We all need each other. We depend on each other."

New Yorkers have depended on each other to get through this crisis, Jordan said.

"They have united because everyone had the same emotions," she said. "In an emotional sense, everyone was poor."

Although New York has a huge problem with homelessness, Cobb said, the Sept. 11 attacks seemed to affect the poorest of the poor.

"In some cases, there were more people on the streets after Sept. 11," he said, "but there also was a sense of folks willing to engage these people face to face."

Willingness to help one another - and the belief that nobody needs to be alone - is what united the group's service work and visit to St. Paul's Chapel.

"Whether it is through hunger and homelessness or if it is with the rescue workers at Ground Zero," Cobb said, "we wanted to let them know they are not alone and that God is always present with them."

The students also came back with the realization that they are not alone.

"I would never say I am the same person after seeing that," Townsend said. "I don't take what I have for granted as much anymore. I realized I have been blessed. I have the chance to go to college, eat when I want to, sleep in an actual bed, in an actual home. It is an amazing gift."

TO THE POINT University, city should notice obvious errors

When it comes to water bills, K-State and the City of Manhattan just can't get their acts together.

A second underbilling recently was discovered at Van Zile Dining Hall. The first, at Colbert Hills Golf Course, was found in July.

Both the city and the university are involved in this mistake.

How can K-State officials truthfully claim they weren't suspicious when they started receiving $15 water bills?

And how can the city fail to ensure that meter malfunctions are taken care of properly?

Budgets are being cut drastically, and K-State needs to keep better track of its funds. It doesn't have the money to reimburse the city in large quantities, so officials should communicate more efficiently with the city to avoid errors in the billing process.

But the city also needs to communicate with the university.

It is the city's responsibility to monitor all accounts and further investigate those that seem suspicious. It should not take two years to uncover a serious error.

University and city officials need to start opening up the communication lines and owning up to their responsibilities so costly oversights such as this do not happen again.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

RAISING A RUCKUS

For our sake, U.S. should not support action against Iraq

War is not a nice, happy thing. Because of this, the United States should look long and hard for peaceful solutions to international conflicts. We are not some vigilante force ordained by Jesus or Allah or Democracy or L. Ron Hubbard to bring our version of blood 'n' justice to the world.

We should not start a war with Iraq. That course of action would be stupid and violent and would detract from our attempts to curtail terrorist activity throughout the world.

When I first heard that President Bush was planning to seek international support for a U.S. attack on Saddam Hussein's dictatorship, I wasn't surprised. After all, isn't Iraq one of the last "great evils" now that the Soviet Union no longer exists?

But then I actually thought about it. What reasons do we have for going after Saddam? I got a list from the Associated Press wire: disregard for international law; possession of chemical, and possibly nuclear, weapons; and buying missiles with money earmarked for food, to name a few.

Really, though, what has Hussein done that we haven't?

We have so little respect for international law that it isn't even funny. For example, remember the missile treaty we violated a while back?

Breaking that treaty allowed us to resume development of nuclear arms and methods of warhead delivery. Add to that the fact that we have one of the largest nuclear arsenals on earth, and it starts to look hypocritical of us not to allow "rogue" states like Iraq to have a couple of their own.

Are we about to start condemning other nations for mispending their national budgets? The issue in Iraq, according to the AP, relates to buying missiles with petroleum money earmarked for food.

Just look at the defense spending of the United States, folks. We spend hundreds of billions of dollars on our military every year, and there are still homeless people in our nation. There are also people who don't have enough to eat. But we've sure got us some missiles, boy howdy!

I'm not saying Iraq is blameless, but isn't it hypocritical to condemn Hussein for the same things we are doing?

And we have yet to see solid evidence of Iraq-supported terrorist activities. I, like Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien, desire more than Bush administration allegations before we start an all-out war.

Bush's plan for attacking Iraq lacks international support. Even after the president's impassioned appeal last week to the U.N., the international community has yet to respond positively.

For a time, it was questionable whether the U.S. would even have a place to launch attacks if the U.N. agreed to support the war. Saudi Arabia, the nation from which we launched many attacks during the Persian Gulf War in the early '90s, was completely against the idea until Monday morning. According to National Public Radio news, the Saudi Arabian government will support U.S. action if America has U.N. backing.

Nevertheless, our traditional allies are anything but enthusiastic about the potential conflict. This, unlike the Gulf War, is not an action to protect the defenseless. It is instead an attempt by the Bush administration to bring down what it believes to be a bad government.

The United States should not unilaterally undertake a war against Iraq. The cost would be too high, and the yield would be too low.

If we attack at all, it should be under the auspices of the U.N., and it should be justified by hard evidence of either terrorist activities or plans to harm other nations.

War is too painful, dangerous and destructive to wage without a real reason.

Paul White's comic is titled "America!" but there's a lot more to this country than the politics of President Bush. Mr. White should expand his topic list so he encompasses everything this country has to offer. Maybe more people would read what he has to say.

To the people bassing in their cars: you are not cool. It's time to escape from the high-school mentality and grow up.

Another football player arrested. Way to create role models, Bill Snyder. Way to go with that leadership. Keep up the good work.

Yeah, Disney called. They want their banner back.

Please - for the love of all that is straight - stop the spirit fingers.

Mimi Bobeck is the most beautiful lady I've ever seen.

I wish I had a nice girl to cuddle up with, but I will make do with coffee.

I've been arrested four times in the last two years. Maybe I should join the football team and start getting it easy.

Judging by the caller's amazing grasp of the English language, I'm guessing the comment on Monday about football players bringing in all the money was called in by a football player.

I'd like to take this opportunity to welcome K-State to the 2002 football season.

TO THE EDITOR

Arguments against vouchers unsound

Editor,

In the Sept. 16 Collegian, Christopher Harrop attempts to argue why he has reservations about school vouchers. What he writes raises some questions.

"Tax-funded vouchers are just what they state to be - tax funded. Public funds will be utilized to educate America's youth."

That makes good sense. If our government makes schooling mandatory, it must also accept an obligation to fund it.

But Harrop continues with: "Just as much of the general population relies on the public school system due to federal and state funding, the same scenario will play out with parochial and other private institutions getting a lump of money straight from Uncle Sam."

How is that again? Are not vouchers given to parents, who then may choose freely which school will receive them? That is the same way funds from Pell grants and NEA scholarships find their way from government to school. Such funds arrive from individual students - they are not set by enrollment count.

"When private schools become comfortable with this new funding, they will become complacent in their efforts to offer a quality education - the same argument advocates cite when proclaiming the trouble with the current public education system."

Once more, how is that again? To the best of my knowledge, public schools rely on a captive market - home address defines where the child goes to school. But the parents of a child can carry a voucher to any school of their choice rather than be forced to enroll their child in the nearest public school.

Schools financed by vouchers, be they public or private, have to earn their funding by demonstrating their quality. That leaves little room for "complacency" - such schools will have to do it right, with competent faculty, suitable facilities and lean staffing.

"Apparently, voucher advocates have no qualms with using public dollars to go directly to non-secular institutions."

Nor need they. Voucher funds do not go directly to any institution - they go to individuals - and are then beyond control of the government.

So do Pell grants, NEA scholarships and, for that matter, funds from the GI Bill that made it possible for the generation of your grandparents to get a college education.

They could use those funds to go to Notre Dame, to Yeshiva University, to Bethel College or to any other place. To my knowledge, none of those funding programs have ever been challenged on First-Amendment grounds.

Harrop might have reasons to frown on voucher programs, but his arguments do not stand up to scrutiny.

Nationally acclaimed insect exhibit features state-of-the-art displays

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Insect Zoo is one of the "10 Great Places to get Bug-Eyed over Insects" according to an article in the Sept. 5 edition of USA Today.

K-State was the only university zoo listed in the article. Others listed include the San Diego Zoo and the National Museum of Natural History.

Ralph Charlton, associate professor of entomology and zoo director, said that it was an honor for the zoo to be mentioned.

The zoo, he said, includes state-of-the-art exhibits that usually are found only in large zoos and museums, like those on the USA Today list.

"It's quite an honor (to be included) because these other places operate on fairly substantial budgets, while we operate on the generosity of donors," Charlton said.

Charlton also mentioned the extreme varieties of specimen that can be seen at the zoo.

"I think we've kind of taken it to another level," Charlton said. "We have an incredible variety of things."

Some of the features of the zoo are interactive displays, an amazon tree with an orb spider inhabitant, and a colony of leafcutter ants.

"We have probably the greatest variety of insects," Charlton said. "Not only that, but we allow others to handle and touch some of the more benign creatures."

Marlene Charlton, zoo manager, said the main exhibit will be a tropical tree that will have a pool with tropical trees and plants beneath it. She said this exhibit is in the process of being built.

She also said the night cave, which will be cut off in a dark area, will be a big attraction when it is completed.

"A lot of insects are active at night time, so (the exhibit) will be like a cave. I also think it will have sound effects, which will be neat," Marlene said.

Ralph said having the zoo is excellent for tours, especially for children.

"I think it's a good way to break the ice and get their attention," Ralph said.

He said the insect zoo has allowed a more hands-on approach with live animals rather than brittle specimen. He also noted it is more convenient for tours.

"It's allowed us to have a central facility where we can deal with tours and the public," he said. "It's our vehicle for outreach."

The insect zoo, located in an old dairy barn in the University Gardens, is the result of a 6-month construction project.

The zoo was opened to the public June 15, but is not completely finished, the Charltons said.

Ralph said a goal is to have all displays ready for the grand opening ceremony Oct. 18.

President Jon Wefald will be one of the featured speakers at the ceremony at 5 p.m. in the University Gardens.

"Not only is this an opening, but we're using this as a vehicle to thank all the people who helped fund this and make the dream a reality," Ralph said.

Michelle Kaczmarek, tour coordinator, said she hoped the article in USA Today will boost the number of visitors to the zoo.

"It's great that we got national recognition," she said. "Hopefully, people will come to K-State and say 'Hey, let's swing by the insect garden.'"

Although the zoo is not complete and has not been advertised, Ralph estimated that it has already been visited by more than 1,000 people from 30 states and 10 different countries.

He said he expects this number to rise to 10,000 or 20,000 visitors each year once an advertising campaign is established.

Marlene agreed that the number of visitors will rise.

"My opinion is that once we're up and running it'll be a big attraction," she said.

Fiend gets fix in game

Almost-real football game cures addiction

BEN FEHR

There might be nothing quite like a trip to sunny Wagner Field at KSU Stadium on a late September afternoon.

There's the tension in the air when a big game finally rolls around, the trill of the Wabash Cannonball on a big touchdown and all that gorgeous purple.

So what do you do when you're hungry for such an atmosphere on a Tuesday?

Ladies and gents — I give you NCAA Football 2003 for Playstation 2, X-Box and Gamecube.

Take the reins of the 2002 Wildcats and line them up for a preview of this weekend's big showdown with USC.

With your every move highlighted by the commentary of Brad Nessler, Lee Corso and Kirk Herbstreit, put the game on the easiest setting and pummel Trojan cheap-shot artist Troy Polamalu into groveling submission.

Reset and repeat to your heart's content.

And it doesn't have to be just the Trojans.

Set up any gameday scenario you can imagine, in any venue that exists, complete with accurate stadium layouts.

New for 2003 is a rivalry-game feature where you can reenact the annual behind-the-woodshed Jayhawk beat-down known as the "battle" for the Governor's Cup.

Every known rivalry can be played out as well — traveling trophies are included with almost every one.

That way, even when it's an exhibition, there's always something to play for.

But if you're like me, meaningless border wars and trophies fashioned out of axes and oaken buckets isn't your bag. Enter the dynasty setting.

This classic feature allows you to take any Division-I team all the way to the top. But it doesn't end there.

Graduating seniors and money-hungry draft chasers are exported from your squad at the conclusion of each season, and then you go on the recruiting trail to garner your next batch of superstars.

Grab as many standouts as you can, and set your depth chart on both sides of the ball. Set your schedule — yes, K-State can play whomever you please in the preseason — and hit the road toward yet another championship campaign.

And the list goes on. There are fully automated stats and rankings, cheerleaders and even mascot teams you can play with (the Florida Gator chugging down the field at twice the speed of any mortal man is enough to make you wet yourself).

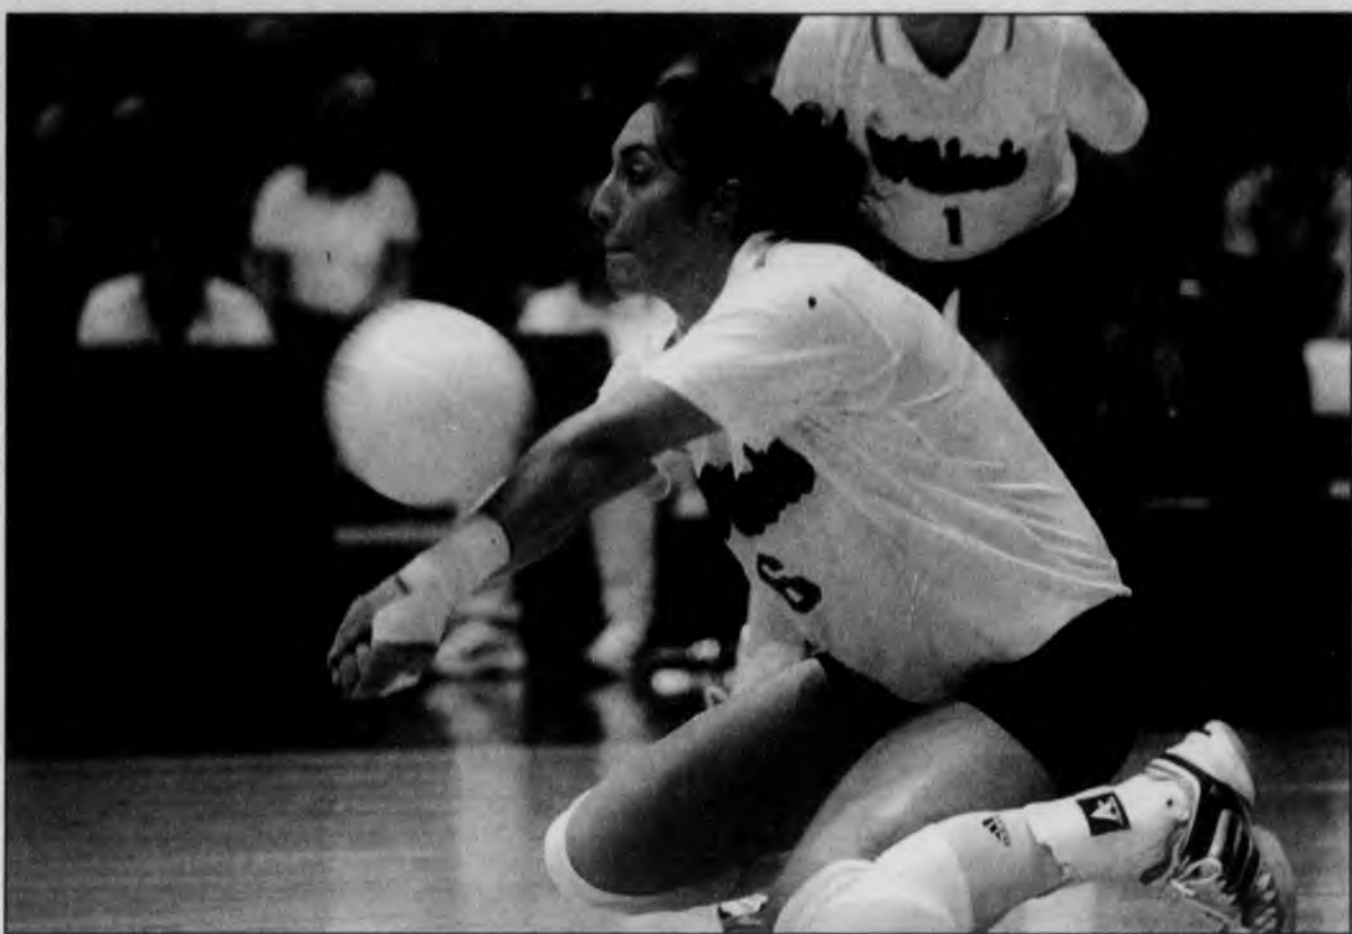

The hours you burn up on this baby will roll away almost unnoticed, with all the drama of a botched fourth-quarter option pitch.

Not since the point-and-shoot glee of Tecmo Super Bowl has a sports game been so capable of capturing the attention and admiration of boys and men alike.

Oh, and with more seasons and national championships than I'd care to mention here under my belt, I'm proclaiming myself the greatest NCAA Football 2003 player on the face of the planet.

Challenges are welcome, but if you're not accustomed to bitter defeat, it's not advisable.

Wildcats start league play against familiar Big 12 foe; team hopes to end streak

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

To say K-State's match with Nebraska tonight is big-time would be an understatement.

Not only are the Huskers (7-1) the Cats' biggest conference rival, but any time the No. 4 team in the nation comes to town, playing your best is a priority.

If K-State (4-4) doesn't play top volleyball, it might be a quick night, senior Jennifer Pollard said.

On top of that, Nebraska also has won 29 straight against K-State at Ahearn Field House.

But despite NU's storied domination of the Cats, players are still convinced it comes down to what K-State can do offensively and whether they stay in system at all times in the match.

"Sure they're big and they're physical, and we're concerned about them," Pollard said.

"But we're more concerned with opening Big 12 play by doing things right on our side of the net."

Lately, the Cats haven't been doing that.

K-State dropped matches to South Florida, Michigan State and Georgia Tech over the week-end, matches the Cats knew they should have won.

And the biggest factor in the Cats' recent losing ways has been serving, Coach Susie Fritz said. In order to stay in matches, K-State will have to serve more aggressively and limit errors, she said.

"It's a delicate issue when you're talking about keeping your team confident," Fritz said.

"We're going through

Golf teams finish 3rd among strong competition

Men tie Michigan State with stellar final-round 291

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team used a final round score of 291 to jump from a tie for sixth place — its place after two rounds — to a tie for third place at the Inverness Invitational in Toledo, Ohio.

The Cats finished the tournament with a team score of 889, trailing only the University of Florida at 878 and Oklahoma State with 887.

K-State found itself in a tie with Michigan State in third place after the Spartans shot a final round score of 299.

"The tournament was a success when you play with the teams we played with," Coach Tim Norris said. "This is a big step up for us."

Norris said he liked his team's consistency throughout the tournament, something K-State teams have lacked in the past.

"It was a good round," he said. "I can't say enough about the whole week. We didn't have a let-down round."

Junior Greg Douglas led K-State for the second day straight. He finished in a career-best seventh place, firing an even-par 71 on the final day. His previous best finish was last season at the Wildcat Invitational, where he finished in ninth place.

"It was a breakthrough tournament for Greg," Norris said. "He puts in a lot of time, and that the other guys don't, and his work ethic is great. It is a good reward for what he puts into it."

This is the second consecutive week in which the Wildcats have finished in a tie for third place, but coach Norris said this one had a much better feel to it.

"To say I feel better is an understatement," he said. "This course is among the best we'll face all year. Six of the top 25 teams in the nation were at this tournament, and the rest aren't too far behind."

"It's a good step forward for us. Now we need to step up and play a little better on our home course."

K-State's next action is at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate at Manhattan's Colbert Hills Golf Course on Sept. 30 and Oct. 1.

Boucher ties for 3rd place in 1st action this season

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The women's golf team finished yesterday's final round of the Chip-N-Club invitational in Lincoln, Neb., in third place, behind Iowa State and Missouri.

K-State shot a 304 in the final round, finishing with a score of 919. Iowa State had the winning score of 914 and Missouri ended with a 917.

Missouri had the best team score of the day with a 299, something that impressed Coach Kristi Knight.

"Missouri played well today," she said. "It was quite a bit windier today, but they played well."

Knight said if it weren't for a poor first round on Monday, in which the Cats shot a 311, they might have had a chance to win the tournament.

"If we could have a do-over, it would be the first round," Knight said. "We shot the same thing today as we did yesterday afternoon. We played well today. Nebraska shot a 304, and they've been playing this course for a month."

Junior Christine Boucher, a native of Rouyn-Noranda, Quebec, led the Wildcats with consistent play throughout the tournament.

Boucher shot a 2-over-par 74 in the final round and finished in a tie for third place.

"I think I did a pretty good job today," she said. "I was consistent all week. I struggled hitting the ball today, but I did a good job of getting up and down. So I'm pleased with the way I played."

K-State's strong final round is something Knight said she would like to see the team build upon.

"We played pretty well today," she said. "The first round hurt us, but we gave ourselves a chance."

"We gained ground," she said. "We were tied for third after the first two rounds and ended up alone in third place. We had a strong finish in a strong field for the first time out."

K-State returns to action this Friday at the Mary Fossum Invitational in East Lansing, Mich.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Children's book illustrator Cheryl Harness is working on writing and illustrating her 15th book, a history of Thomas Jefferson written for children.

The illustrator has work displayed at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art in the exhibit "Beyond Oz: Children's Book Illustrations from the Region." She will give a presentation at 7 p.m. Thursday in the museum about her work and the research that goes into it.

Cheryl Harness
CHILDREN'S BOOK
ILLUSTRATOR

Harness, 51, worked with Hallmark before illustrating her own books, which deal with historical themes. Here is what she had to say about her work.

Q: Your Web site biography mentioned that at first, editors weren't really willing to work with you. What has kept you illustrating throughout the years?

A: I was working steady, and I kept working on illustrations, and I knew in my heart I wanted to do books. I've found that it isn't just talent but persistence that is the main thing in this business. Every little bit of success helps to feed you for the next work. That and the hope that you will finally create something that will blow them away.

Q: How do you come up with your ideas?

A: I work mainly in historic fiction, so I try to create stories for people who once lived. With some research, you can see that our history is so rich, and that's what I like to bring out in my books. For instance, I'm working on a Thomas Jefferson book because of the bicentennial of the Lewis & Clark expedition.

Q: Why do you have a historical theme that often deals with ghosts?

A: I first got the idea with the book "Ghosts of the White House." I thought it was a fun concept, and the publisher liked the idea of the ghosts. It's a book about someone who goes back in time and meets historical figures, so it's not like scary "Boo!" ghosts.

Q: What are you going to talk about when you come to the Beach Museum of Art?

A: I'll basically talk about my work in general. I'm going to talk about the step-by-step process and the research that is involved. I'll also show some slides and bring along my paint box.

I'm looking forward to the question-and-answer sessions with the kids. History has a reputation of being boring, and I try to make it lively and funny. People see Lincoln and Washington as stoic figures on money, but they were heroic and very human. They just lived from day to day, and life was difficult for them.

I try to bring that out and talk about them as actual people. If I can make some kids laugh in the process, it makes me happy.

Students organize painting group

Society provides accessibility for aspiring artistsBy JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Painting students are organizing a group that will help artists find personal direction through exposure to different works and styles.

The K-State Painting Society will have its first official meeting at 4:30 p.m. Sunday. The meeting will take place at the end of an artists' reception that is open to the public from 3 to 5 p.m. at the Willard Art Gallery in Willard 116.

The reception will feature artists from the last spring's Advanced Painting and Painting II class taught by Xuhong Shang, associate art professor.

Shang is the organization's sponsor and took the initiative to organize the society, Jenny Meyer, society secretary, said.

Meyer, junior in painting, said the society is open to painting majors and freshmen and sophomores working on becoming painting majors. It was organized to give artists direction and exposure through working together, traveling to see art and showing art in local venues.

The most accessible venue to the society is the Willard Gallery, where Meyer is showing the oil painting, "My First Still Life." Group shows like this one display a broad spectrum of talent, Meyer said.

"Everyone works with different styles and mediums, and it broadens all our horizons to see each other's art," she said.

One show that already has received moderate success is the exhibit Evgeniya Parish, sophomore in art, has on display at Java Espresso and Bakery, Meyer said.

"She's sold three small pieces and one large piece off the wall there," she said. "It just shows that this community is willing to buy art. But we need to get it out there for people to see."

Carol Sprawka, senior in art, is the society's president. Sprawka, who has an untitled piece in the Willard Gallery exhibit, said she is looking forward to traveling with the group to see outside work.

"Last spring, I went to Chicago with the rest of Xuhong's class, and I think it opens you up," she said. "We really got to see what else is out there, and it made me feel like I'm not as strange as I thought, because I'm not a landscape artist or anything like that."

Meyer said the society plans to meet once a month, and she is looking forward to the exchange of ideas it will provide.

She said her interest in art was sparked partly by her grandmother's artistry.

While Meyer feels most confident with oil paints she said she still needs to distinguish herself.

"I feel like I need more direction as an artist," she said. "I'd like to experiment with a little of everything, and this will give me that chance and help me find that direction."

COMING UP

Arein, (pronounced Uh-Rain), will play at 10 tonight at Dave's Hideaway, opening for Orange.

Arein competed in Opus Friday, and though the band didn't place, vocalist and guitarist Vi Tran, senior in theater and English, said he is optimistic about the band's future. The band has played only a handful of gigs, and Tran said that after being together for more than two years and experiencing several setbacks, the band is ready to start playing more regularly.

After playing Friday, Tran said, the band was asked to open for Orange, which will be a good start for a return to playing live.

Q: Why haven't you played much these past two years?

A: It's been tough because whenever the ball would start rolling, things would fall through. Back in Jan. of 2000, I met a guitar player and singer, and we formed a four-piece band. In the beginning, we were just prolific. We wrote about 30 songs and jumped right into recording an album. We were about 10 songs into it when the band just fell apart.

The bass player and I were the only ones left, and we were just persistent about keeping it together. I assumed the role of lead vocals as well as all the songwriting. We revamped the line-up and adopted a more aggressive approach.

Q: What kind of music are you working on mostly?

A: We want to write music that is interesting and poetic. We draw influences from literature that we try to combine with a sound that is melodic. I think there is a void out there for intelligent, literate, mainstream rock.

So far, I've brought all the songs to the band, and we have about 12 songs all put together, but I'd like to see things move more towards a band democracy with everyone bringing songs.

Experience as undergraduates helps keep faculty at K-State

School's reputation for excellence made administrators stay

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Did you know that Pat Bosco, dean of student life, was K-State's student body president in 1970-71?

He isn't the only faculty member at K-State who also attended the university as an undergraduate.

Bosco, Janice Wissman, associate dean of education, and Scott Staggenborg, extension specialist in crops and soils, are also faculty members who have spent their undergraduate years and the bulk of their professional careers at K-State.

Bosco has been working at K-State ever since he graduated with a bachelor's degree in elementary education in 1971.

Originally from Syracuse, N.Y., Bosco said he searched all over the country for a Midwest, Big 12 school that genuinely cared about its students. He said he found a match at K-State.

"I arrived in Manhattan in 1969 and didn't know a soul," Bosco said. "Not only in Manhattan, but not even in the entire state of Kansas."

After graduation, Bosco had several positions at K-State, including coordinator of student activities, associate dean of student life, assistant associate vice president, director of enrollment management, assistant vice president for institutional advancement and his current position as dean of student life.

Bosco, who has worked more than 32 years at K-State, also has the assistant professor rank in the College of Education.

"Our institution's emphasis on leadership and student involvement had a tremendous effect on myself as a young professor in the early '70s," he said.

Bosco said his favorite aspects of K-State are the students and the K-State spirit.

"It's a pleasure to serve students and work with faculty and staff who care," Bosco said.

Wissman grew up near Manhattan but said she didn't fully appreciate K-State until she started her professional career.

"I took K-State for granted because I grew up 60 miles from Manhattan," she said. "I knew in high school that I wanted to teach, and fortunately for me, one of the best programs in the teaching field was at Kansas State University. I realized when I started working in California that K-State prepared me very well for my role in teaching, so I went back and got my master's at K-State."

After earning her master's degree in 1968, Wissman went to the University of Kansas and earned her doctorate in higher education administration in 1981.

"I knew I wanted to go to K-State because I knew they had an exemplary teacher education program, and since I wanted to enhance my teaching skills, K-State was at the top of my list," Wissman said.

Wissman graduated from K-State in 1963 with a bachelor's degree in family and consumer sciences education. She has been an employee for 34 years.

Wissman has had a handful of positions at K-State, including instructor and assistant professor of secondary education, assistant dean of the College of Education and her current position as associate dean of the College of Education.

"My favorite part about my job is not only working with the students in the College of Education, but I'm also the adviser for the Mortar Board, which allows me to work with some of the very best students at K-State. I enjoy that a lot."

Like Wissman, Staggenborg lived close to Manhattan. He has been the extension specialist in crops and soils since 1995.

"I knew I was going to be coming to school here a long time before I actually came," Staggenborg said. "My brother was going here, and our minds were made up several years before we actually came here. We grew up K-State fans."

Staggenborg graduated from K-State with a bachelor's degree in agronomy in 1988 and a master's degree in agronomy and agriculture in 1990.

After earning his master's degree, Staggenborg went to Texas Tech University to earn his doctoral degree.

"One of my favorite things of working here and being involved in the K-State faculty is that we have a very strong agriculture college, which is something I'm very proud of," Staggenborg said. "I'm also glad we have a football team now. Six years ago when I was attending K-State, we won a total of two games, and I think tied one. It's a nice change."

Student Alumni Association recruits 150 members in 1st year on campus

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Student Alumni Association, which is in its first semester of existence, already has recruited 150 members.

Courtney Marshall, the association's director of member services, said one of SAA's goals is to have 200 to 300 members in its first year on campus.

Marshall said students heard about SAA primarily through word of mouth.

She said posters were placed in campus living establishments, and the SAA worked with the Student Alumni Board during Wildcat Welcome Days, an event at the K-State Alumni Center earlier this year, to promote their organizations.

Another key in getting the word out was the new student orientation, Marshall said.

"It wasn't anything specific — just a combination of efforts — is how we got that number," Marshall said.

Lance Zimmerman, junior in agriculture communications, said his membership in the SAA spurred from his involvement in the SAB.

"I knew how important it is for students to be connected with the alumni board and alumni," Zimmerman said.

Marshall said the main difference between the SAA and the SAB was that the board's membership was based on an interview process. She said the SAA doesn't select its members — anyone can join, and it's fun.

"The Student Alumni Association is a fun organization," she said.

"A lot of students are curious about the center, and this group will be utilizing the center on a regular basis."

Karen Schroeder, director of alumni services, said the K-State Alumni Association is excited about the SAA's presence on campus.

"The organization is to give the Alumni Association a chance to interact with the students and to let the students know what the association is about," she said. "We're really excited for the program."

The SAA is not a money-making organization, Marshall said. The activities the SAA organizes will be paid for by the annual $15 membership fee.

Members receive a kit containing an SAA T-shirt, coupons for local businesses and information on different clubs. Marshall said she now is working on getting members discounted food in Aggieville restaurants.

Marshall said a possible SAA event might include coffee and snack breaks during finals week, but that the schedule wasn't set yet.

"We haven't set definite activities because we want it to be driven by what the students want to do," Marshall said.

"With the Alumni Association moving back to campus, we wanted to educate students on efforts we do and to get involved in local businesses," Marshall said.

VOLLEYBALL | After 3-loss weekend showing, volleyball looking to right ship against No. 4 Nebraska

some battles right now that we'll have to conquer before becoming a great volleyball team."

The Cats have had just two practices since those matches in Florida, too. Fritz said she's not convinced everything is fixed going into tonight's contest with Nebraska.

"We're experiencing some growing pains right now," she said.

"I don't think you can fix them in two days of practice. We've got some serving issues."

Nebraska, moreover, is a team that doesn't have many issues.

The Huskers' lone loss on the season is to Southern California, the No. 1 team in the nation.

But not much has changed about Nebraska, Fritz said.

"They are a lot like they were a year ago," she said.

"Without Nancy Metcalf and without Jenny Kropp, they aren't as experienced, but I still think they are very athletic and very talented."

Senior Laura Downey-Wallace said Nebraska's systems are very simple, but they execute them so well.

"They really only run two patterns on offense, but they're really good at running them," Downey-Wallace said. "They block a lot of balls, too, so we need to keep covering out hitters and try to get second and third and even fourth opportunities."

But K-State might not get that many opportunities.

The reason, outside hitter Cari Jensen said, is they are good in every aspect of the game.

"They take care of the little things," Jensen said. "They're always swinging hard, not giving teams anything to work with — that's what makes them good."

Last season with Nancy Metcalf, the Huskers swept the Cats in both meetings during the regular season and defeated the Cats in four games to advance in the NCAA tournament.

That was the closest K-State has been to tasting victory at the hands of the Huskers.

Pollard was with the team the last time the Cats upset Nebraska.

That day was Sept. 22, 1999.

It was the only time K-State defeated the Huskers in 65 meetings.

The co-captain said the Cats have the ability to do it again.

"I remember what the feeling was like to beat them when we did my freshman year," Pollard said. "To be on the floor when that happened was just amazing — and to do it again would be really special."

WATER | Van Zile Hall underbilled for 2 years' usage; city, university in process of determining repayment plan

meter, thus making each reading lower than it actually was.

The city and Colbert Hills officials are in the process of determining a plan for a repayment process, Hayen said.

Although Hayen said the city is taking the blame for both errors, he said the university must have known there was a problem with its bill.

"It is no different than a residence," he said. "You know something is wrong when your bill is significantly lower. K-State had to have a set budget for water usage, but it is always a question of do you wait for it to be discovered or report it? Still, the ultimate responsibility is the city's."

Harper said the fault lies with the city.

"It is their responsibility," he said. "They read our meter and bill us."

A plan for a repayment process has not been established, but Hayen said the city will not bill the university in one lump sum.

"We will determine the amount of money and work out a process," he said.

Harper said he still is unsure how much the university owes.

"I am not sure if we will be able to determine that amount," he said. "We will fix the meter, and then they should be able to properly track our water usage."

The city is working on safeguards to prevent this from recurring.

"I think we have enjoyed a good relationship with the university," Hayen said. "This is just one of the cases that has slipped through the cracks, and it sends a clear message something is wrong."

The university has an unusual relationship with the city. The city of Manhattan provides water service, but K-State is responsible for maintenance — including replacing malfunctioning meters.

"That partnership ought to exist," Hayen said. "When a meter goes bad, we need to communicate that quickly to K-State officials, and they need to replace them. Unfortunately, these two cases were missed somewhere in the chain."

To prevent missing another case, the city plans to improve its system in three main areas. The first will be to redefine the university's status. Water usage now is separated into two categories — residential and business. Hayden wants the university to become its own separate category.

"It makes sense," he said. "They are major users of city water. It should help us catch the mistakes because we would be able to look at the water being produced compared to the water being consumed at a more precise level."

The second safeguard is to implement a reverse override system in the billing process. At present, the process has a set ceiling for water usage. If a bill goes above that amount, the system automatically generates a report. The reverse override system would do the opposite — generate a report if the monthly water usage drops below a set floor amount.

The final safeguard deals with new water customers. For every new user, like Target or Home Depot, the city will find a retail establishment in the system that is similar and compare monthly use for six months to ensure the meter is working properly.

"It is embarrassing to have these mistakes," Hayen said. "We just want to take every possible step to prevent this from happening in the future."

50 beds to meet the current and potential demand. Norris said they are trying to raise funds and search for a bigger facility. They rent the building they are in, but Norris said she would like that to change.

"We're putting a lot of wear and tear into a facility that isn't our own," she said.

She said the shelter served about 515 people last year — the highest number since 1997 when it served 525.

"And we are well on our way to exceeding that 525," she said.

The poor economy has contributed to increased numbers, Norris said. From Sept. 1 to 13 alone, they served 30 people. Norris said that August and September are always the busiest months.

Money raised by the event will help the shelter meet its own fund-raising goal, and it also will help pay the bills.

"The last few years, this group has literally paid the bills during September and October," Norris said.

The group also collects other donations, such as toiletries and other supplies.

Silver Key President Seth Sanders said the group was taking leadership through action. They learned about the problem and acted on it.

"It's good because we've got an honorary that wants to do something outside the college and do something for the community," he said.

Sanders said he was surprised when he learned how many homeless people the shelter serves each year.

"I come from a smaller town, so it's just not so prevalent," Sanders, who is from Sterling, Kan., said. "It's more prevalent in the bigger cities. If anything, it just makes me realize if it's this big of a problem here, I can't imagine how bad it is in a city like Kansas City or Wichita."

Besides making people aware, he said the group wanted to have fun.

"It's college," Sanders said. "It's supposed to be fun. How many people are going to be able to say they slept out on the Union courtyard?"

IRAQ | Weapon inspectors prepare to enter Baghdad

Blix then met with Iraqi representatives, after which the Iraqis announced talks were set for Sept. 27 to make final plans.

In the Middle East, the business of preparing for war went on as American warplanes flew under aggressive new rules over Iraq, and U.S. commanders considered basing heavy bombers closer by.

At a U.N. news conference at which Powell and Russia's Igor Ivanov laid out conflicting views, Secretary-General Kofi Annan appealed for them to stick together on Iraq.

This is "the beginning, not an end," he said. "We should try to maintain the unity of purpose that has emerged."

The Security Council then went into closed-door consultations on a timetable for dealing with the fast-changing Iraq issue. The council sent weapons inspectors into Iraq after the 1990-91 Gulf War, to ensure that President Saddam Hussein's regime destroyed any chemical or biological weapons it possessed, as well as the capacity to produce those or nuclear weapons.

ahead of U.S. air strikes, amid Iraqi allegations that some were spying for the United States and countercharges that Baghdad wasn't cooperating with the inspection teams.

The international "unity of purpose" that Annan cited emerged when President Bush, in a speech to the U.N. General Assembly last Thursday, forcefully called for the Security Council to threaten action against Iraq if it did not allow the inspectors back.

If the world body didn't act, Bush made clear, Washington would feel free to launch a military attack.

Bush's was the opening move in what may become a high-stakes diplomatic chess game.

Iraq's surprise reply came late Monday, in a letter to Annan in which Foreign Minister Naji Sabri said Baghdad would allow the inspectors back "without conditions" in order to "remove any doubts that Iraq still possesses weapons of mass destruction."

On Tuesday, Annan told reporters that chief inspector Blix "is ready to move as quickly as is practicable."

Asked when the inspectors might actually return to Bagdad, Iraqi representative Saeed Hasan replied, "It depends on Mr. Blix's arrangements."

The secretary-general indicated he didn't believe any formal reauthorization is needed from the Security Council, whose previous resolutions set out specific conditions for their return.

The Bush administration late Monday had dismissed the Iraqi move as a ploy to split the Security Council. On Tuesday, Powell was equally dismissive.

"We cannot just take a one-and-a-quarter-page letter as the end of this matter," Powell told reporters. "We have seen this game before" — a reference to Iraqi delays and obstructions of past inspections.

The U.S. military prepared for possible confrontation in the Middle East.

The Pentagon disclosed it had ordered pilots, as they patrol Iraqi skies, to attack command and communications links in Iraq's anti-aircraft system.

It also said it might base B-2 stealth bombers on Britain's Indian Ocean island of Diego Garcia, that would halve their normal flight time from U.S. bases to Iraq.

that students in the college-age group don't participate more in voting, so we are trying to target all students."

Moreover, with the upcoming election of a new governor and various educational debates on the line, Peterson said she feels this year is an especially crucial one for students to register and vote.

"I think it's particularly important this year to get out and vote because we're electing a new governor for the first time in eight years, and in Manhattan we're electing two new state representatives," she said. "It's also important for the students to vote because the state's financial condition is directly related to the university budget."

Student Body President Zac Cook agreed, adding that if even half of K-State students voted, they could make a difference.

"Students need to realize that their vote will count if they register," he said. "If half of the student body were to vote, that's 10,000 more people in Kansas that will have a voice."

The SGA hopes that voting will help students be influential and feel like part of the community.

"We live here nine months out of the year," King said. "It's important that students get a voice and be heard."

KSDB returns to Union following controversy

Language, format concerns forces building officials to reduce station's airplay

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Relations between the K-State Student Union and KSDB-FM 91.9 haven't developed quite the way either party had hoped as the station adjusts to its new surroundings this semester.

The Union will begin airing KSDB in the Union Bookstore again today, after format and language concerns voiced by some customers forced officials to stop playing the station at the beginning of the school year.

That, KSDB music director Eric Hoopingarner said, has some station employees wondering about the move.

"The Union really wanted us in here, so I don't get why they're not playing us," he said. "They wanted us here real bad, and now they're dropping the ball."

Hoopingarner said the move was made in order to gain greater exposure on campus, but low airplay has worked as a barrier.

"If they're not going to play us in the building that we're in, what's the point?" he said.

Although relocation agreements do not include playtime guarantees, station manager Candy Walton said informal talks with Union administrators have been productive.

"We've talked about it in passing," she said. "It's always been brought up in meetings, but it's never been something that would make or break any of the deals we've made."

"We've expressed interest in having it played, and they've expressed interest in investigating it."

Jessica Strecker, summer 2002 program director and current Student Publications employee, said developing the radio station's identity within the Union should be a top priority for both sides.

"It's extremely important, especially if we want to improve the quality of the radio station," she said. "If DJs know that everyone is listening to them, they clean up their act. But when it feels like nobody's listening to you, it's different."

People were listening, at least in the Union Bookstore, during the summer, until complaints about some controversial language were made, Bernard Pitts, Union executive director, said.

"Because of some of the formatting and some of the language that was used on air, it made it uncomfortable for some of our customers and some of our employees," he said.

"We backed off on that, but I've shared with Candy, and she understands that this isn't like your home, where you have the ability to turn the station off or on if you're in disagreement or are uncomfortable with what is aired. This is a public building, and I have a variety of different publics that come into the building."

Format and discipline issues are handled by the station's employees, Walton said, and in the

State receives funds to develop defense tactics, equipment

The U.S. Department of Justice awarded $4,151,000 to the Kansas Highway Patrol for the State Domestic Preparedness Program.

Sen. Sam Brownback announced the grant, called the Homeland Security Grant, last week.

This national program distributes monies based upon a formula, which essentially depends on state or district population, not on a vulnerability rating scale, said Glenda Kendrick, a representative for the Department of Justice.

Capt. Tim Lockett, emergency operations coordinator for the Kansas Highway Patrol, said of the $4.2 million, $184,000 will be used to conduct and evaluate weapons of mass destruction exercises and $3.9 million will be used for equipment.

"This division of the grant is based on the state strategy," Kendrick said. "The strategy says that we know particular places might be likely targets and we need the following resources."

Lockett said there are four categories of first responder equipment that are authorized expenditures by the grant.

Personal protective equipment is the first category. This equipment includes a self-contained breathing apparatus and other protective suits that first responders would wear if working with hazardous materials.

The grant also can provide for detection equipment. This equipment tells responders if they are in a hazardous atmosphere that would

Salina student, instructor make emergency landing

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An aviation student and instructor from K-State-Salina were forced to make an emergency landing Wednesday afternoon after the aircraft experienced engine trouble.

"There was an engine problem, but at this time we are unaware of what caused it," said Marlon Johnston, head of the aviation department K-State-Salina.

Johnston said there were no injuries as a result of the emergency landing, and the plane was relatively unharmed.

"It was a very successful emergency situation," he said. "There was some very slight damage to a headlight."

Johnston said students in the aviation program are trained to handle emergency situations.

"In our training program, the pilots are trained in emergency precautions, and they practice what to do in case of a problem," he said.

Johnston said nothing could have been done to prevent engine failure in the Sundowner airplane.

"You own your car and no matter what you do to keep it in good condition, there are bound to be problems," he said.

Mechanics at the aviation school will tear down the plane and try to determine the cause of the engine failure, Johnston said.

Johnston said officials should know the cause of the failure by today or Friday.

Bars getting smart about falsified IDs

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Corey O'Brien was a minor and wanted to get into the bars, he would turn to his brother for help.

"I had my brother's ID," O'Brien, senior in wildlife biology, said. "I didn't have one made. It worked pretty much everywhere."

O'Brien, now 22, admits that the tricks he pulled a couple of years ago are much harder to accomplish now.

"My freshman year, it was really easy to get into a place," he said. "It's gotten a lot harder since I got here."

Now, because of stringent Kansas laws, Manhattan bars are cracking down more than ever to ban false IDs from entering into their businesses.

Bar owners and operators said they have to be cautious about underage drinking.

"It's not something we can afford to mess around with," said Jess Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's Parlor. "If we get caught with even one minor, the penalty is so high it's not worth taking the chance."

According to Riley County Police Officer Larry George, businesses can get fined if police find a minor inside the premises.

Webmail system still giving students headaches

Increased e-mail usage to blame for recent service failures

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It began Sept. 9 when students and faculty across campus began noticing problems while using their K-State e-mail accounts.

Louie Novak, junior in public relations, said he became frustrated when he couldn't access his Webmail account.

He wasn't alone.

"I tried to e-mail my professor and it was really tough for me to get through," Novak said. "At first I thought it was because I didn't renew my password, but I guess everyone has been having problems."

According to an investigation by Computing and Network Services, increasing e-mail usage caused the central e-mail system to experience slowdowns during peak usage times - weekdays from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. The investigation pointed to 814 e-mail users with inbox folders of 20 to 250 megabytes each, much more than the recommended five megabytes.

On Tuesday, CNS notified users with large accounts to reduce their inboxes to five megabytes by noon Wednesday. Inboxes not reduced by the deadline were moved to a different folder. However, no e-mail messages should have been lost.

Harvard Townsend, CNS director, said too many large mailboxes were contending for the same location, and the short notice was necessary.

"We didn't anticipate this problem to creep up on us like it did," Townsend said.

"E-mail usage hit a threshold, and there was no other alternative but to move larger folders to another location," Townsend said e-mail users with large inboxes had difficulty accessing their accounts, and therefore couldn't reduce their inbox size.

"It was kind of a catch-22," he said. "Users with large accounts needed to Panelists addressed topics challenging the university such as tuition rates, the Union Bookstore outsourcing and diversity during a public forum sponsored by Mortar Board on Wednesday.

The topics were discussed during lunchtime in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

Bernard Pitts, director of the Union, addressed the question of what K-State receives from promotional advertisement on campus grounds. Pitts referred to companies such as Starter that negotiate with K-State to sponsor events and offer activities to students in exchange for the opportunity to distribute products and advertise.

"It is a way to educate students and provide recreation in a fun environment. It builds community," Pitts said.

As the dialogue progressed, what started as a handful of audience members grew to include students who were in between class destinations. Two microphones were positioned for audience members to ask questions, one facing the panel, another on the second floor of the Union.

Brad Vining, junior in accounting and finance, asked the panel to clarify the K-State's partnership with Varney's Book Store.

"I saw the opportunity to ask questions of some influential people on campus," Vining said. Pitts fielded Vining's question.

"I don't buy the fact that monopoly is negative," Pitts said. "Looking at the larger picture -- the move to privatization is a way to minimize extra taxation on our students. In some ways, it can be good."

Steve Levine, manager and owner of the Union Bookstore and manager of Varney's, defended Varney's, noting the store's loyalty to the community and its service to students for more than 100 years.

"I'd actually heard Mr. Levine talk on the radio before," Vining said. "They explained the context well and the measures they've taken to keep it from being a monopoly. I felt they took adequate time to address any questions."

As the discussion evolved, Zac Cook, student body president, talked about his involvement with ethnic organizations and his commitment to help strengthen leadership within them.

Myra Gordon, associate provost for diversity and dual career development, also spoke. She encouraged students to study abroad and to seek opportunities outside Europe, emphasizing study in Asia, Africa and the Americas.

"It is important that when we open up education, we do so for the entire world," Gordon said. "It is important for students to see the discipline of what they learn here, around the world."

A recurring theme throughout the forum was that due to state budget cuts, a K-State education now comes at a more costly price.

Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, reassured students that the budget crisis would be handled efficiently.

"This is an opportunity for us to rethink some things," Krause said. "What are the essentials we need to protect? At the heart of this is your faculty and educational resources."

A lighter spot in the forum was when women's basketball coach Deb Patterson spoke of the team's national success and the positive promotion her program has received in the past year.

"We proved, on a national level, that our community will support and validate the success of the women's program," Patterson said. "We have a model that young boys and girls have to look up to in the women's program. And, being a woman, I like that."

As the crowd dispersed, students said they were satisfied with the forum's content, even if reality continued to pose problems.

"They dispelled some myths, answered the questions, but some of the stuff they said isn't reassuring," Josh Sturgis, senior in political science, said.

"The university shouldn't continue to spend money, looking down the road, assuming the economy will be good."

Sturgis said the student presence and involvement was satisfactory for the annual event.

"You always want there to be more students, more questions asked, but this is just kind of the way things always go here," Sturgis said.

Brownback says Congress supporting Bush

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been one week since the United States has paid tribute to those who died in the Sept. 11 attacks, and President Bush is once again trying to find answers to what the country should be doing about Iraq.

"The major debates we have going on right now is Iraq and what the United States should be doing at this time," Sen. Sam Brownback R-Kan. said in a teleconference Wednesday. "Last week, President Bush made a forceful case to the United Nations that the world community can no longer afford to ignore the problem of Saddam Hussein."

Brownback said Congress has supported Bush's decisions over the past two weeks, and members plan to do so in the coming months.

"I see a lot of support for the president," he said. "Frankly, I think he's had an amazing two weeks of moving the issue forward on confronting Saddam Hussein."

"I've heard almost unanimous positive comments that we should be giving the President the authority to pursue this as he sees best."

Since the Gulf War, Brownback said, Saddam continues to have and pursue weapons of mass destruction.

In 1998, Congress passed the Iraq Liberation Act and since then, Saddam has violated 16 different resolutions, Brownback said. Therefore, he said, the president has asked the United Nations to take responsibility.

"The president has called upon the U.N. to take up its responsibility and to ensure consequences with resolutions or else risk becoming an irrelevant body," he said. "If Saddam Hussein wants peace, he will comply with the U.N. resolution. If not, he'll risk his regime of being forced out."

Moreover, Bush has been working to increase the number of allies the United States supports, Brownback said.

"I think that two weeks ago, the only ally that was very open about it that was supporting the United States was Great Britain," Brownback said. "Now, we have some of the Gulf States and Saudi Arabia is saying we can use their base."

Although Congress supports the president and his decision, Brownback said, he has further concerns with Saddam.

"My biggest concern on this is if Saddam Hussein decides to start handing out weapons to terrorist groups that they would take those to various sites around the world including the United States," Brownback said.

U.S., Britain spell out compliance resolution

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Bucking an anti-war mood among their U.N. Security Council partners, the United States and Britain began crafting a toughly worded resolution Wednesday that would narrow the timetable for Iraqi compliance with weapons inspections and authorize force if Iraq fails to cooperate, diplomats said.

The two allies plan to complete and circulate the draft next week to the three other permanent members of the Security Council — France, Russia and China — diplomats told The Associated Press on condition of anonymity. France, Russia and Arab nations oppose a new resolution.

"Nothing is on paper yet," said Rick Grennell, spokesman for the U.S. mission at the United Nations, who confirmed American and British diplomats met on a resolution.

Iraq's surprise announcement this week that it would accept the return of international weapons inspectors nearly four years after they left has divided the council, with the United States stepping up preparations for war even as weapons inspectors planned their return to Baghdad.

In Washington, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told Congress that it should authorize the use of military force against Iraq before the Security Council makes a move.

"No terrorist state poses a greater and more immediate threat to the security of our people and the stability of the world than the regime of Saddam Hussein in Iraq," Rumsfeld told the House Armed Services Committee on Wednesday.

President Bush, also speaking Wednesday, said Iraq would not "fool anybody" with its about-face and predicted the United Nations would rally behind the United States despite Iraq's "ploy." His administration disclosed plans for moving B-2 bombers closer to Baghdad, preparing for possible war to remove President Saddam Hussein.

But at the United Nations, U.S. allies on the Security Council seemed determined to stave-off a resolution as plans moved ahead for the return of weapons inspectors.

"We hope that this step ... will be the first step toward a comprehensive solution to the crisis in the relations between the United Nations and Iraq and the lifting of the brutal regime of sanctions, which has been killing our people for 12 years," Iraqi Foreign Minister Najib Sabri said late Wednesday after meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

In a statement, Annan said that Sabri had pledged his government's full cooperation on finalizing arrangements for the swift return of inspectors.

On Tuesday, Russian Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov said he saw no need for another resolution on Iraq. But in

Lacrosse president takes unlikely path to leadership

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tim Vanwyke was going to walk by the Lacrosse Club table last year and never look back.

However, members of the club hollered at him to sign up, so he did.

This year, Vanwyke, junior in microbiology, is the president of the Lacrosse Club.

"The first time I ever saw a game was one I was in," he said.

Last year Vanwyke received the Team Co-Rookie of the Year Award. He said this award set the tone for him to be involved with the team.

"Some are scared because they've never seen a game," he said. "I went from not knowing, too, and now I'm a starter."

Josh Brautigam, senior in kinesiology, heard about the Lacrosse Club when he was living in the residence halls. He said Vanwyke picked up the game quickly last year.

"Every year we get new players that are new to the sport," Brautigam said. "Some pick it up quick, and some take a little longer. Tim was one that picked it up really quick and we were able to use him right away on the field."

Vanwyke said he played basketball in high school, which helped because he said the team runs plays similar to those used in basketball.

While Vanwyke said he likes how lacrosse keeps him in shape, his favorite aspect of the club is the road trips.

"I like to hang out with the guys and visiting the different colleges and meeting new people," he said.

The club plays against colleges such as the University of Kansas and the University of Nebraska. The farthest the team will travel this year is to St. Louis, Mo.

As far as equipment goes, Vanwyke said new players usually borrow other members' equipment until they find out if they want to continue to play the sport and buy their own.

Depending on a person's preference, Vanwyke said, a full set of equipment could cost from $200 to $400.

"If you are new to the sport, we recommend getting used equipment, which is significantly lower in price, until you are sure you want to stick with the game," he said. "I played my first season only paying $20 for a used set of shoulder pads—the rest of my equipment was loaned or given to me."

Interested students should e-mail lav@ksu.edu or attend practice at the Memorial Stadium from 6:30 to 9 p.m. Monday, Wednesday and Friday, and 9:30 to 11 p.m. Tuesday.

Source: Tim VanWyke, Lacrosse Club President

Any full-time student can join the club, and there is a $150 registration fee due to the club in December, but fund raisers pay for most of it, Vanwyke said.

Shane Apple, junior in radio and television, and secretary of the club, said to raise funds, lacrosse members take down chair backs at the KSU Stadium at the end of football season.

"I wouldn't exactly call it fun, but it's working together with your teammates," Apple said. "Any hardships you go through with your friends makes you bond more. It helps build character, and there's a lot of stairs, which helps develop the legs."

Vanwyke said there is also a banquet where practice jerseys are auctioned off.

Although the Lacrosse Club's season officially starts in the spring, its first game this fall is against Colorado School of Mines on Sept. 21 and 22 in Golden, Colo.

The club even has its own tournament, the Donnie Tillar Tournament on Oct. 5 and 6. The tournament is dedicated to the club's first coach, Donnie Tillar, who was killed in Desert Storm in a helicopter crash. To honor him, club members wear a helicopter symbol on their helmets.

"It's our symbol to honor Donnie every game," Apple said. "The tournament is a good way to test out how good we are and what we need to work on."

Apple said since lacrosse is a high-impact sport, there are a lot of injuries.

"It's like football with sticks—injuries are bound to happen," Apple said. "Most end up playing through their injuries."

Vanwyke said he has seen some injuries during his time on the team, too.

"The worst injury I have seen was someone who was hit in the ear hole of their helmet with a shot and had their eardrum ruptured," Vanwyke said. "Other than that, people usually sprain ankles or have other common sports injuries."

TO THE POINT CNS needs to be ready to meet students' needs

Recent increases in Webmail usage have caused students and professors to experience extremely slow or no service.

Computing and Network Services issued a release on webmail.ksu.edu explaining the problem and what people could do to help.

People with mailboxes exceeding the recommended storage limit were asked to clean out unnecessary messages or their inboxes would be moved to another system.

This was helpful, as many experienced faster service after the noon deadline Wednesday.

However, the problem should not have progressed to this. CNS should have prepared better for the increase in students using the campus Webmail system.

If the university cannot upgrade its e-mail services by purchasing a server to provide more space, it needs to do a better job of monitoring those users who store large amounts of information.

CNS should follow examples of other e-mail providers and require a storage limit of no more than three megabytes.

Or charge those who claim they need more space. K-State could definitely benefit from the extra revenue.

ANGRY ANCESTORS

Slave descendants should receive reparations through education

America can no longer be known as a country of empty promises. It is time for some accountability around here.

Realistically, it is impossible and ridiculous to track down slave ancestors and set them up with 40 acres and a mule — it's really just symbolic.

Here's a bit of a history lesson: The phrase "forty acres and a mule" comes from Special Field Order 15 during the reconstruction following the Civil War in 1865. This was a deal that William T. Sherman made with black ministers, which set aside parts of Georgia and South Carolina coasts as black settlement. Later, the U.S. Army wanted to get rid of its mules, so it threw them into the deal.

The deal never materialized. Still, it was made, and it should have been followed through.

In a modern sense, Ebony Magazine editor Lerone Bennett Jr., calls for 205 years of back-pay. Trying to sue America for $777 trillion is not possible, unbelievable and really quite silly.

A courtroom is no place to fight what happened in that regrettable chapter of this country. In no way is it the proper venue to address the situation — it would take years of court time to figure it all out. Besides, the United States has sovereign immunity and cannot be sued.

Lawsuits add to the victimized attitudes with which Americans are already flawed.

Sending cash to every descendent of U.S. slaves is unwise and would probably even be counter-productive for blacks. A check in the mail is no way to eliminate the evils of the past, but there is a logical and sensible way to go about it.

Providing more funds for education can, over time, bridge the gap. I call upon the federal government to use infusions of development and reconstruct the poorest of poor black communities — at least provide more scholarships, not in the name of apology, but in the name of progression.

This will benefit the entire nation.

What are the reparations supposed to pay for? Pain and suffering? No, you can't pay somebody for their ancestors' anguish. But what you can do is shine some light on the black population, which has been ground under in this country. You can help those through education who cannot help themselves.

America has the capability to compensate the impoverished black communities by at least attempting to level the playing field.

Education is needed, and scholarships are completely necessary.

There should be a public trust that all citizens pay into, regardless of ancestry, which would go to dramatic intervention in the worst neighborhoods.

We know reparations are possible because they have been done before. The United States paid $20,000 to individual Japanese-Americans who were detained during World War II. Victims of the Rosewood rampage in Florida received nearly $2 million for their strife. Officials have talked about giving scholarships and memorials for the Tulsa riot, which devastated the Negro Wall Street neighborhood in 1921 (www.npr.org and Justice Talking/National Public Radio Aug. 27, 2001).

It is possible, ethical and fair, and it should be done in a way that benefits us all.

Recent headway at the United Nation's World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, makes reparations look a little more promising. Slavery was finally named as a crime against humanity, and current slavery problems in northwest Africa will be studied more intensely.

But if you're a slave descendent in the United States, I would not look for a check or apology any time soon.

LAYTON EHMKE

ANDREW LAWSON

Ending slavery in other nations more important than reparations

Though the issue only gained national attention in the last few years, the idea of slavery reparations has been around for a while.

For instance, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., tried to introduce a bill every year since 1989 to examine the case for reparations.

Luckily for sensible Americans, Congress refused to listen to him every time.

Most legislators understand that the argument for tossing large sums of money at people who have not directly suffered slavery is shaky and weak at best.

According to www.about.com, the latest development in this dispute is a lawsuit filed on behalf of 35 million black people against three corporations.

This suit demands descendants of slaves be paid for their ancestors' forced labor and harsh treatment.

It also requests monetary compensation equal to "forty acres and a mule," which was the payment the United States promised freed slaves but never forked over.

Of course, when inflation is taken into account, those filing suits think they need $777 trillion.

I understand the precedent of making reparations to Japanese-American families for their suffering in internment camps, and the same for Jewish families who suffered as slave laborers in Nazi Germany.

The difference between those cases and this situation, though, is that many of those unfortunate individuals were still alive when the reparations were made.

There is not one single living individual who was a slave in the United States.

The descendants will have an extremely hard time proving they have suffered financial damage when they are generations removed from the crimes.

One plausible solution, though, would be to accept that the corporations should still pay for their crimes.

After all, if a plantation owner from the Civil War era were alive today, would anybody tolerate him avoiding punishment?

By legal definition, a corporation is like an individual, and can be held just as accountable. So there is no reason why FleetBoston Financial, CSX and Aetna shouldn't be made to pay, right?

Wrong. Those corporations were never in existence at the time slavery flourished. They are descendants of companies that did use slave labor, but time, mergers and other business reorganizations have left them as completely different entities.

There is only one organization still around that condoned, enforced and encouraged slavery at some point.

I'm talking about the U.S. government.

If any form of reparations is to be made, Washington is better equipped to afford it than America's struggling corporations.

So what kind of reparations are we talking about?

I tend to think enough reparations have been made through progress in civil rights, affirmative action, numerous scholarship funds and welfare.

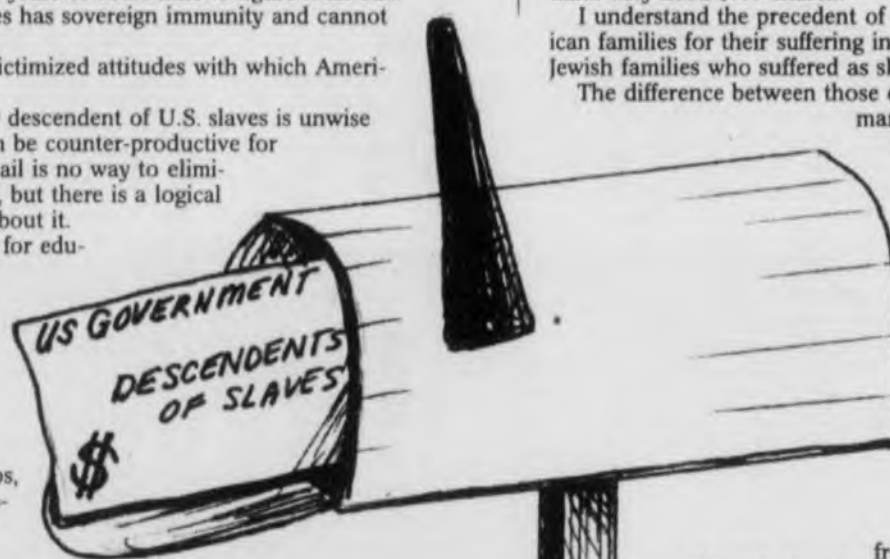

Sure, President Bush could issue a formal apology, but that won't appease people who are suing solely out of greed. We have cigarette lawsuits and fast food lawsuits — now 35 million people have seen another way to make an easy buck.

The most important thing we can do with this blood money is stop pointing our fingers over events that happened 150 years ago. No one on this planet was responsible for what happened.

Instead, these wasteful efforts should be channeled into stopping slavery for good.

Yes, slavery still exists, and it is flourishing in parts of Africa, like Sudan and some western countries.

Instead of debating this endlessly in the courts, this nation should lead the charge in preventing more of these tragedies from taking place.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

I thought it was E-I-E-I-O, not E-I-E-I-U.

I don't know why everybody is complaining about the comic strip, "America!" It is a sophisticated and educational strip that should open the minds of all college students.

So we're big enough adults to pay tuition, but we're not big enough adults to decide when we go to school and when we don't want to?

The next person who blows smoke my way on campus is going to get their cigarette shoved up their nose.

No you didn't quit your fraternity — you got kicked out for smoking weed.

How helpful is an IT help desk that refuses to answer their own phone?

This coming from a non-football player — he got a speeding ticket and forgot to pay it. Big deal. It doesn't need to be on the front page of the newspaper.

I was just wondering if the students bashing the football players in the Fourum are the same students sitting in the student section on Saturdays.

One nation, indivisible, except for that time the South tried to secede.

Hi there. I'm calling from Canada. We're better than you for one simple reason: In our elections, the guy who gets the most votes wins. Canada rules.

If K-State beats USC on Saturday, do not tear down the goal posts.

Why do boys feel the need to hide their true feelings from the women they adore?

A big thanks to the Wal-Mart check-out guy. By the way, it was negative.

Paul White, I think your comic is freaking awesome.

Keep up the good work.

Let me guess. Somebody's going to read my Paul White comment and tell me to "Get the hell out of the country."

The one thing that K-State home games are missing that would make them really good: Peanut vendors.

I am fed up with the Fourum. I hate the Fourum. I'm not even going to satisfy them by finishing my sentence.

Why do all my friends think I'm stupid?

Out in the west-Kansas apartment of Woodway, I fell in love with a Mexican girl.

Fact: The band members from Dead Lemon are ninjas.

Cox Communications — everybody needs Cox.

Heads should be rolling in Anderson Hall and the athletic department for the sale of KKSU radio, and we should start at the top.

Does anyone know the second verse of the diarrhea song?

As soon as they put in a skating rink at Rusty's Last Chance, I'll be in heaven.

I'm tired of all my guy friends using me for my brains. The least they could do is use me for my body, too.

We should change the name of "To Be Continued" to "Discontinued."

Instead of a parking garage, can we build a skywalk for the squirrels, please?

TO THE EDITOR

Students who skip classes cheat themselves, waste taxpayers' money

Editor,

I disagree with the position the paper has taken on class attendance.

You have missed a very important point: Students are not the only ones who pay for the classes.

I am a taxpayer, and K-State is a taxpayer-supported school.

You seem to have forgotten this very important point. When a student does not attend class, that student is wasting my tax money. Taxpayers should not be expected to pay for something without getting something back, like students attending the classes in which they enrolled.

When I was in college, I could not always get into a class because of class size.

One could almost always count on someone failing because he or she did not attend class and learn the material.

This is a lack of responsibility.

The paper is doing a disservice to the students, the school and the taxpayers by taking the position that the school should not force attendance.

If K-State was a private school and was not supported by taxpayers, then your position would be acceptable. It is not as a taxpayer-supported school.

I would appreciate a response as to why the paper believes it is OK to waste my tax money by providing facilities for students who waste these resources.

Madness starts new year; hosts plan for experimental theater tradition

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Midnight Madness rules: No rehearsals allowed. No directors involved.

No editing the script, and no holding anything back. No experience is necessary.

For one night each month, theater department students transform the Purple Masque Theatre into a high energy, uncensored comedy club with an event they have affectionately named Midnight Madness.

With a four-year history at K-State, Midnight Madness is student-run, with two hosts overseeing the festivities.

This year, Dan Ireton, senior in theater, and Tara Bauer, junior in theater, have the hosting responsibilities of picking a theme for student playwrights to explore and delegating the flow of the night's activities.

"The hosts just hold it together and guide people through it," Stephanie King, junior in theater, said.

Showtime

Midnight Madness will be at 11:30 tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium. This week's theme is exploitation.

The first Midnight Madness of the school year will be at 11:30 tonight.

The night begins with anonymous, student-written scripts being laid on the stage floor with as many copies as needed.

After rallying the audience with a few call-back chants, the hosts pick up the scripts and ask for volunteers from the audience to play each role.

From there, the play is in the hands of the students and at the mercy of the audience, King said.

The short plays hit on a variety of styles, Bauer said.

"The plays are usually funny, though some are serious," she said. "It's uncensored, so it gets kind of crazy."

Not only do the actors create characters on the spot, but the plays themselves are usually written a few days in advance, at most. The theme for tonight, exploitation, was formally announced Wednesday.

The themes usually are posted on the call board in Nichols Hall sometime during the week of Midnight Madness.

Jimbo Ivy, junior in theater, has written more than 30 plays since he started participating in Midnight Madness as a freshman.

He said he enjoys writing plays within 24 hours because he thinks it makes them fresh.

"It's a one-time shot — you don't have time to revise it," Ivy said.

"Midnight Madness is geared toward fun, but it also allows you to practice your art in an environment without professional pressure."

Because Midnight Madness is student-run, it allows student playwrights to explore more liberties, Ivy said.

Even the theme is to be taken as a suggestion or a starting point for writers, he said.

About the only restriction put on Midnight Madness is the limited space of the Purple Masque.

Last year, Midnight Madness outgrew itself and the hosts were forced to cut back attendance.

However, patrons don't want this to discourage anyone from coming.

King said the limited capacity of the Purple Masque is a key element in the success of Midnight Madness.

"If it does turn out that they have to turn people away, try again," King said.

"Just come back earlier the next month."

"It's such an intimate space, and when there are a lot of people, there is a closeness and the energy level is really high."

As a host, Bauer agrees that a packed house makes the night more enjoyable.

"I hope we get a really good crowd, that they are real excited and willing to jump up and be a part of it," Bauer said.

"The audience creates the atmosphere."

American Idol contestants reunite

The 30 finalists from Fox television's "American Idol" singing competition will reunite in Las Vegas for a two-hour special.

The show, to be taped Wednesday at the MGM Grand hotel-casino, will air Monday night on Fox.

Kelly Clarkson, the 20-year-old winner, will perform her new single, "A Moment Like This," plus two other songs.

Clarkson's music video, "Before Your Love," will air during the show, which will feature performances from Las Vegas landmarks such as the Strip and Fremont Street.

After the broadcast, viewers will be able to vote on which song Clarkson should record next. The results will be announced Tuesday.

The "American Idol" contest began with 10,000 entrants vying for a prize that many singers work years for — a recording contract, a professional manager and the opportunity to perform in front of millions of people.

"The Godfather" voted greatest movie

"The Godfather" — not "Citizen Kane" — is the greatest movie of all time, according to a new Zagat survey. The "Zagat Movie Guide," which comes out this week, is a collection of the top 1,000 movies, as rated and reviewed by 5,338 movie fans. "Casablanca" is No. 2 on the list, followed by "Star Wars," "Gone With the Wind" and "The Shawshank Redemption."

The Collegian wants to know what music you are listening to. If you are passionate about music and want to express your opinion, e-mail A&E Editor JJ Duncan at jduncan\_80@hotmail.com.

This week we asked Laura Kidd, junior in biology, what she's listening to.

What five albums are you listening to and why?

1. Dave Matthews Band: "Busted Stuff"

I didn't like "Everyday" as much as his other stuff, but "Busted Stuff" is good. It's not as poppy as "Everyday." I like the songs with slower beats like "Grace is Gone" and "Gray Street."

2. The Calling: "Camino Palmero"

It's good mellow music for when I study, and I like the singer's voice. I started listening to it after my roommate from the dorms last year and I bought it.

3. Lifehouse: "No Name Face"

I like them for the same reasons I like The Calling. My boyfriend downloaded a bunch of their songs onto my computer and I started to listen to it.

4. Martina McBride: No specific album

She has a beautiful voice, and I like the lyrics in her love songs. Allison Krauss is almost too soft for me, Martina has that strong voice.

5. Nickelback: "Silver Side Up"

I listen to this when I'm in the mood for something louder. I like to run and work out to Nickelback because of the harder sound.

BIG RED RECAP

Nebraska continues dominance with 3-game sweep over Cats at Ahearn

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Game 1: K-State 25, NU 30
Game 2: K-State 16, NU 30
Game 3: K-State 27, NU 30

Nearly 3,000 screaming fans, most of whom were decked in purple, provided an electric atmosphere Wednesday night for K-State's match with No. 5 Nebraska.

But the Huskers quieted the crowd and rolled to an easy 30-25, 30-16, 30-27 win over the Cats at Ahearn Field House.

The three-game sweep of K-State on Wednesday marked the 30th consecutive win for NU on K-State's home court.

But the Cats (4-5, 0-1) weren't about to accept pearls or any other gift the Huskers (8-1, 1-0) might have had to commemorate the victory.

Instead, they walked away taking pride in making the match competitive to the end.

"I thought we played with some composure, which was something we lacked this last weekend," Coach Suzie Fritz said. "When you have an inexperienced team, you're going to play sporadic. We stayed in rallies for the most part, and we had opportunities to swing for points. Some went our way, and some didn't."

On paper, the Cats hung with Nebraska. Both teams dug 55 balls, and K-State even served less errors (6-5).

But Wildcat hitters committed 14 more errors, while hitting just .119 for the match.

"Sometimes I think our mentality is that we're not supposed to win because it's Nebraska," outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said.

"When we're playing and we're right with them, we just have to be the aggressor and take control of little opportunities."

After an up and down first game, the second was exactly the opposite.

The Huskers controlled tempo early in the game, then put the nail in the coffin when they went on a 10-0 run to put the Cats out of reach.

Pollard had four kills, but committed five errors as well, as Nebraska held the Cats to a zero hitting percentage.

"That hurt us real bad," setter Gabby Guerre said. "Once you get on a run, it's kind of hard to get out of it. And the first couple of points, OK you have some options to take, but three or four points, you're like, 'what do I do now, I've tried everything.' And I don't want to say you're hoping to get out of it at that point, but it's hard because you've tried everything."

K-State tried everything to stay in the final set, but big Husker kills, combined with officiating calls that didn't go the Cats' way, kept K-State from extending the match.

The third game was the Cats' best, as they hit .261, led by Pollard's five kills.

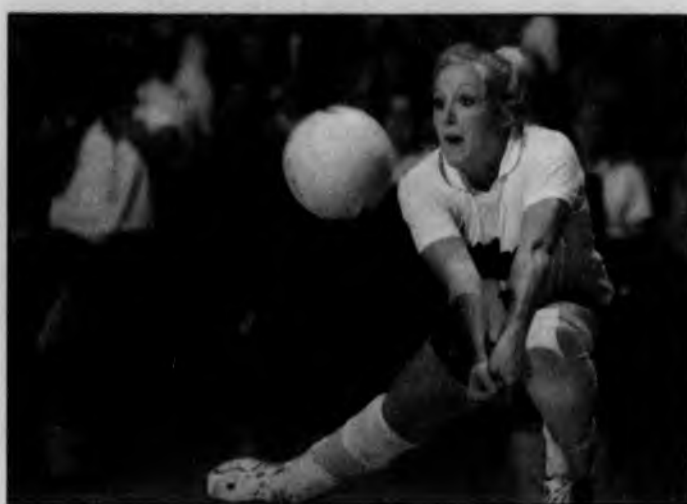

"Later in that third game, we were getting better," Pollard said. "But by then it was too late."

Pollard had a team-high 13 kills for the match. Guerre and libero Laura Downey-Wallace led the Cats defensively with 14 and 10 digs, respectively.

Guerre said it was encouraging to see the team respond after coming out of the locker room. It would have been easy to lie down and let Nebraska take the match, she said.

"You could tell they were a little on edge there. That's when we need to push," she said.

"We hung in there, and that's what we take from this."

Jami Sleichter bumps the ball in K-State's loss to Nebraska in Ahearn Field House on Wednesday night. The Cats return home Sept. 28 to play Texas.

Husker defense holds true to form against determined K-State offensive effort

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Winning points at the net against Nebraska was like hitting through a brick wall, outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said.

Pollard said the Cornhusker defense was just too good in Wednesday night's loss.

"The Nebraska defense really is like a wall," she said. "Sometimes you just have to hit the wall and hope they don't cover."

Fifteen Husker blocks and 55 digs proved how strong the defense really was.

Nebraska middle blocker Amber Holmquist said the NU defense didn't give up points easily.

"We pride ourselves on our defense and our blocks, and we prepare for it," Holmquist said. "We came out here and did what we practiced to do."

Holmquist said she came to Manhattan knowing the first Big 12 match for both teams would be tough. It was, so she expected both teams to play physical volleyball.

"It's great to get K-State out of the way. They are a great team, and now we can focus on the rest of the season," she said. "It feels good to know we don't have to play here again, until maybe in the post-season."

son."

Pollard, too, said she is happy the match is over.

"We know we can play with them, but it's good to have Nebraska early in the season because now we know we don't have to worry about the blocks," Pollard said.

The Wildcats didn't offer much in game two, but Coach Suzie Fritz said she was pleased with her team's performance. K-State served and passed better than the Huskers.

Even when the Wildcats had their system going, NU denied points. In game one, defensive specialist Jami Sleichter sparked the Cats in a 4-0 rally to give K-State an early lead.

However, the Huskers started handling the serves better, and K-State saw few scoring runs. Holmquist said her team adjusted and started playing a little deeper to return serves.

"They were serving tough, but we found a rhythm," she said. "In that rhythm, we started blocking, hitting and serving well for a combined total package. And we were able to put together a couple of big scoring runs."

"When you have big scoring runs, your teammates work hard to keep it going."

Fritz said she was not disappointed. She knew Nebraska was talented and liked to play tough, physical volleyball.

However, Fritz said, she would have liked to see a cleaner match. There were several controversial net and double-hit calls that should have favored the Cats, she said.

But the Wildcats also had more than double the Husker errors, 26 to 12. That, coupled with an overpowering defense, made it hard to build momentum.

"Our defense played well," Nebraska coach John Cook said. "We want to play at this level all the time. We can dominate teams when we play good defense."

Win over Trojans could build momentum for football, set tone for rest of season

Coming into the 2002 season, K-State was widely considered to be a team on the decline.

Most betting men had the Cats resting a distant third in the Big 12 North, behind perennial powerhouse Nebraska and the recently revitalized Colorado Buffaloes. A few even dared to pick upstart Iowa State ahead of the Purple.

Now it's three weeks into the season — minds have changed, and the Cats are faced with a golden opportunity.

Eleventh-ranked USC comes to town on Saturday, and the Cats need the win. The Trojans are fresh off a thorough dismantling of defending Big 12 Champ Colorado. Just one week after traveling to Boulder, the Trojans will venture east again.

A win at home against such a storied program, especially in a season when so much is expected of them, would be a huge momentum builder for the Cats and should propel them to win the North and contend for the Big 12 title and a BCS bowl berth.

The Southern California game did not always seem so important though. Until last weekend, a victory over USC left the Cats with no guarantees.

Colorado was still a threat, and despite their loss in the first game of the season, they're the conference's defending champ.

A top 10 team in Nebraska also promised to offer its share of problems.

But, the door of opportunity was opened in a big way last Saturday.

All of the teams who had been proclaiming to humiliate K-State were humiliated themselves, and the result is a ticket to the Big 12 Championship left out for the taking.

Colorado was the first of the contending teams to slip up. They lost their first game against in-state rival Colorado State. Gary Barnett, Colorado's coach, has yet to win a season opener in his four years in Boulder.

Things went from bad to worse when USC pummeled the Buffaloes 40-3 last weekend.

Barnett now threatens to join Texas head man Mack Brown, and pretty boy Justin Timberlake as the most embarrassingly overrated morons of all time.

The Cats are scheduled to face Colorado on Oct. 5, but even that contest now stands in question as the Buffalo nation is bailing off the bandwagon faster than Terence Newman can return a kickoff.

Somehow I have a feeling that there will be plenty of tickets available to that one.

The other Northern Division favorite, Nebraska, was also exposed this weekend.

The cryogenically frozen Joe Paterno and his Nittany Lions blasted the Cornhuskers 40-7. The vaunted Blackshirt defense collapsed for the third time in five games. The once proud Cornhuskers left the field in shambles, as opposed to the shackles that usually adorn Huskers.

The defeat not only threw the Huskers from the National Championship train, it left them mortally wounded, and tied on the tracks awaiting the Cat Train to seal the deal on Nov. 16 in KSU Stadium.

Iowa State on the other hand is the only other North team with any remaining pride. The Cyclones played Florida State to within an inch of an upset, and have been on cruise control since. Their Nov. 9 trip to the Little Apple should be interesting.

The other North teams never really had a shot to contend, and so far this season have reinforced the fact.

Missouri's glimmer of hope attained by besting Illinois was brought back to Earth, where it belongs, by super powerhouse Bowling Green.

The Jayhawks on the other hand have actually surprised many, and not only because Coach Mark Mangino has yet to get stuck in the locker room door. KU has actually scored a touchdown, and even managed to win a game. Granted it was close until the fourth quarter, but what do you expect from those tough rascals down at Southwest Missouri State?

While the rest of the division bathes in mediocrity, or in Mangino's case, barbecue sauce, the Cats have the opportunity to steal the show. The game Saturday should be used to set a tone for the rest of the season. The Cats need to send a message and romp USC.

If they do beat the Trojans, watch out. It's all downhill after that. I'm confident once we win over Southern California we can win out over our own in-conference competition.

The Big 12 Championship is Dec. 7 in Houston, Texas. Make your reservations now — I'm about to.

NFL | Woodson out 3-6 weeks

Oakland Raiders cornerback Charles Woodson will miss nearly six weeks due to a fractured right shoulder.

Woodson was injured in the Raiders' 30-17 win at Pittsburgh on Sunday, but kept playing. He underwent tests Tuesday, revealing the fracture, coach Bill Callahan said Wednesday.

Callahan, whose team has a bye Sunday, said he would name a replacement starter late next week. Rookie Phillip Buchanon and veteran Terrance Shaw are competing for the spot.

MLB | Loyal Royals fan dies

White-bearded Joe Hess Jr., a Kansas City Royals fan who was a fixture in the right-field stands for more than two decades, is dead at the age of 82.

Hess, whose bushy beard gave him a remarkable likeness to Santa Claus, retired in 1976 after 30 years with the U.S. Department of Agriculture. In retirement he enjoyed playing Santa for children — and going without fail to Royals games.

Until slowed by illness, Hess had attended every home game for 22 years. He'd arrive at the ballpark at 3 p.m. to get in line for his favorite front-row seat in what until this year used to be the general admission area.

Even after the change to a reserved seating policy, the Royals "awarded" Hess his position — Section 144, Row J, Seat 1.

Golf | Augusta still not budging

Even though they'll almost surely never play a professional round there, a handful of LPGA Tour players believe it's time for Augusta National to open its membership to women.

"I can't believe we're still fighting this stuff — racism, gender equality or whatever," U.S. Open champion Juli Inkster said Wednesday from the Solheim Cup. "But that's life, I guess. It's not going to change overnight, but hopefully, in the coming years, it will change."

The National Council of Women's Organizations has been pressuring Augusta National, the private club that runs the Masters, to admit a woman into its membership.

Augusta National chairman Hootie Johnson said he will not be pressured, and last month dropped the tournament's three corporate sponsors so they would not be subject to pressure from the women's group. The Masters will be televised without commercials in 2003.

NCWO chairwoman Martha Burk's next target is CBS, which has said it will televise the 2003 tournament. Last month, the PGA Tour said it would continue to treat the Masters as one of its official tournaments.

NFL | Vick says Bears didn't play nice

Atlanta Falcons quarterback Michael Vick said Wednesday that a Chicago coach, screamed "take his knees out" during a loss to the Bears last weekend. Vick made the allegations, which were backed up by teammate Willie Jackson, against Bears defensive coordinator Greg Blache.

"They were coming up to hit me," Vick said. "I heard one of their coaches scream, 'Take his knees out!' That was their goal, to knock me out of the game."

Blache denied that he wanted to injure Vick, the best running quarterback in the NFL. The coordinator did say he told his players that the best way to tackle Vick was by taking his legs out from under him.

NBA | Former player still missing

FBI agents have joined Tahiti police in investigating the disappearance of Bison Dele, the former NBA player who vanished with two others during a sailboat cruise.

Police said Wednesday that investigators were scouring Dele's 55-foot catamaran. The 33-year-old Dele, formerly known as Brian Williams, his girlfriend, Serena Karlan, and Bertrand Saldo, a French skipper sailing with the group, were last seen July 8 during a layover in the French Pacific territory. ## Fashion show today in Union to showcase club clothes

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Clubwear can be difficult to find in a state best known for its agriculture. That's why Zotci's is having a fashion show at noon today on the first floor of the K-State Student Union, Esther Wiechen, event organizer, said.

"When Sara (Strothman, store owner) first started the store, Manhattan was lacking in going-out clothes," she said.

"That's why the majority of the stuff in our store is club-wear."

"There's a million places you can go and get the same pull-overs or other casual-type stuff, but we try to carry things you won't find at other places."

Wiechen said many stores receive as many as 30 of any given item, but Zotci's limits its inventory to six of each article of clothing so people won't see others wearing the same outfit.

The fashion show will last about 30 minutes with a disc jockey playing music to fit the three city-based themes in the fashion show: Seattle, Kansas City and New York.

"The Seattle part of the show will focus on more of a vintage look, and that will be first while the Kansas City part will have more casual-looking clothes," she said.

"The New York section will be mostly dark and black clothes with kind of a goth look to them."

Eight models, including one male, will show off the fashions with hair and make-up done by Hair Experts, Wiechen said.

Announcer Chris Legler will also be modeling an outfit from the store.

Legler, senior in marketing and human resources management, said he went in the store for a fitting Tuesday to figure out what he would wear, but nothing was set in stone.

The show has had some hold-ups in planning.

Scheduling fittings and hair appointments have been hectic with some models deciding not to participate, Wiechen said.

And when planners found out the scheduled announcer wouldn't be at the show, Wiechen said they asked Legler to try it out.

Though the process is new to Legler, he isn't a complete stranger to modeling.

As a toddler, he posed for Gordon's, formerly the Half Price Store, advertisements.

Besides finding the right outfit, Legler's hair was textured and darkened for the show Monday.

"I didn't have a problem with what they did. It wasn't too much of a change," he said. "I figured if I had a problem with it I could always shave it off afterwards."

Sahana Chandra, senior in electrical engineering, said she had no previous modeling experience but was asked to model while shopping at the Aggieville store.

"I'm a little nervous because it's the busiest time in the Union," she said. "But I think it will be fun."

Wiechen said the show will help to raise awareness, not only of the store, but about new fashions.

Wiechen said she hopes people find clothes they like that are different from what they normally would wear.

"I hope they see stuff that's very out of the ordinary," she said. "People are scared out here in Kansas a lot of times to be different, but our store is very different."

Hopefully they will see fashions that will encourage them to be who they are and wear what they want, and not worry about what other people are wearing."

Dominant themes in this fall's fashion include plenty of dark colors and lace on clothing, Wiechen said.

"One of the biggest trends in these clothes is there are a lot of blacks with almost a goth look," she said.

"Big black crosses, faux fur with lace and tight black boots are all parts of the looks."

Students examine stress after Sept. 11 attacks

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In the wake of the Sept. 11 anniversary, a campus group is studying the effects of post-traumatic stress on couples.

"We are interested in couples with trauma history, whether one or both partners have experienced trauma," said Briana Nelson, assistant professor of marriage and family therapy and faculty adviser to TRECK.

Trauma Research Education and Consultation at K-State, or TRECK, has been around for four years, Nelson said.

The group has given several presentations at both state and national trauma levels.

Mentors also have done clinical work and therapy with trauma survivors, Nelson said.

Ryan Peterson, graduate student in marriage and family therapy and TRECK member, said the group is important.

"Trauma has become a bigger issue - students deal with it every day from the trauma of death, rape or even Sept. 11," Peterson said. "Our mission is to educate people on the effects of trauma on their lives."

Nelson said the information TRECK assembles from the study on post-traumatic stress in couples will be used to educate future therapists.

"We will be presenting data at professional meetings and publishing information in professional journals," she said. "This is something that will be helpful in educating future clinical professionals."

TRECK is inviting anyone who has had a traumatic experience and is in a relationship to contact the group.

"Across campus there have been several traumatic deaths recently," Peterson said. "There is a lot of information on how individuals are affected by trauma, but not much on the impact on relationships."

She said the study requires a time commitment of about two hours during which participants will take part in a confidential questionnaire and interview.

"We recognize that this is a sensitive topic, and we are most interested in how individuals have been affected and how the relationship was affected," Nelson said. "But participants need to know that we won't be asking a lot of personal questions. We don't want to traumatize someone again."

TRECK is hoping to get at least five couples to participate, but Nelson said the more couples who participate, the better.

To participate in the study, students can contact Briana Nelson at 785-532-1490.

FAKE | Bouncers use new technology as deterrent

"If we find an underage person drinking, the bar gets stuck with a fine," he said. "If the bar can show they have made a reasonable attempt, then they cut them some slack."

To reduce the amount of fake IDs entering Auntie Mae's, Denney said the bar has recently purchased an electronic device to swipe all identification cards.

"We have two electronic card swipers," he said. "We swipe every card before we can let them enter."

Most bars, like the Aggie Station Restaurant and Pub, have doormen stand at bar entrances, asking for forms of identification before they let patrons in.

"Whoever looks underage, we ID," said Don Day, senior in business administration and a doorman for Aggie Station. "If the ID is fake, we turn them away basically - we don't let them in."

At Auntie Mae's, the doormen take training courses offered by the Alcoholic Beverage Control and use these tactics when observing an ID.

"The ABC offers classes and seminars that we take for things to look for on a fake ID," Denney said. "Our first thing to look at is if the license is out of state. Then we look at the picture."

Although seminars and classes assist in detecting false IDs, years of practice and common sense are used by a majority of the doormen at the bars and clubs.

"I've seen a lot of IDs that are just terrible - lines across the photo, the laminant will be pulled back," said Patrick Jaquay, security employee for Rusty's Last Chance.

Day said there are certain characteristics to look for in each person walking in.

"Whenever someone looks off in the crowd and they don't look at you, that's a good sign," he said.

When a bar or club pinpoints a fake ID, a variety of necessary steps are taken, with a majority of the businesses asking for another form of identification and then confiscation of the ID.

"We will ask them for another form of ID and if we still have questions, we will contact the Aggieville police," Denney said.

If the police become involved, it's a situation they don't take lightly, George said.

"If the individual has a borrowed or fake ID, a citation is issued and the ID is confiscated," he said. "The citation then goes to the city court, where the court costs are about $200."

"If the individual bought the manufactured ID, the judge will ask for the source, and if they do not tell, the judge has been known to charge approximately $1,000."

Moreover, George said that with the Sept. 11 attacks, students should think before they buy or supply forms of false identification.

"Since 9/11, people could see handling a fake ID as an act of terrorism," he said.

As technology increases, some businesses are finding it harder to find all the signs of a fake ID, and as a result, are letting more minors into their bars.

"I would say there are more slipping by these days," Denney said.

"There's some you can buy on the Internet that look pretty real."

Day also said it was hard to catch everyone who walked through with a fake ID.

"Nobody's perfect, and I'm sure it happens even in the best places," he said.

reduce their folders to fix the problem, but they couldn't even access their folders. Our staff has done the best it can do to resolve the problem, but unfortunately, that required drastic measures."

Townsend said the problem stems from increased e-mail use and an inadequate budget.

"People are using e-mail more, and in more ways," he said.

"Increased enrollment, increased e-mail usage in classes, more mass e-mails, more attachments and virus detection combined, hitting a threshold the server couldn't handle."

CNS is in the process of acquiring a network for storage area as a partial solution to the e-mail performance problem. Budget cuts, though, have limited funding necessary for a complete upgrade of the system, Townsend said.

"We're over the hump now, and we are doing everything we can to prevent similar instances in the future," he said.

be immediately dangerous to life and health.

Another category is decontamination. This equipment is for people who think they were exposed to anthrax and need to take showers. Emergency medical service workers use this equipment when a victim might be exposed to a hazardous substance.

The Kansas Highway Patrol also can purchase equipment for communications. Examples include in-suit communications used in astronaut suits. Another portion is medical supplies, Lockett said.

"As probably everyone knows, one of the problems at the WTC was the different operating systems and different frequencies the police officers and fire fighters had, which made it impossible for them to communicate with each other," Kendrick said.

Lockett said that after Sept. 11, the amount of money Kansas received for the program has increased drastically.

He said the program was implemented in 1999, and Kansas received $554,000 for equipment. In 2000, Kansas received $807,000 and $844,000 in 2001.

"We're not going to get the amount local jurisdictions feel they would need to get to adequately respond to an incident of mass destruction," Lockett said.

"But we are pleased with the increase in funding."

Kendrick said the Homeland Security Grant is a one-time award, but the program is likely to continue because there will be an ongoing need.

case of vulgar language, the Federal Communications Committee establishes its own restrictions.

Bill Hurrelbrink, KSDB program director and senior in social sciences, said the problem was addressed at the beginning of the semester.

"We had a talk about that, and 91.9 has always been kind of a more racier station," he said. "You can get away with a lot more stuff on college radio than you can on commercial. We told people to try to bring it down a little, but it's still a college station."

Although the station's airplay in the Union has been limited, Walton said she is pleased with how KSDB has been received in its new environment.

"They want to support the radio station in any way they can is the feeling I'm getting from them," she said.

"They've worked with us well in everything we've asked them to do."

That communication could mean more airplay in the future, she said.

"Down the road, it might be something we look at trying to formalize, but as long as everything is working out all right, we're not going to push it, and they're not going to either."

IRAQ | Time schedule negotiated for inspections

Moscow Wednesday, Vladimir Lukin, a deputy speaker of the Russian parliament's lower house, who once served as Russia's ambassador to the United States, said Russia would likely compromise.

French diplomats said they were opposed to any resolution that provided Washington with a "green light" to use military force and that they saw no need to replace a resolution drafted primarily by the United States in December 1999.

The existing resolution gives inspectors 60 days from the time they begin work on the ground to give the council a work program. Once the council approves the program and the inspectors and the International Atomic Energy Agency become fully operational, Iraq will need to cooperate and comply for a 120-day period. If it does, the council will be asked to suspend sanctions for 120 days, a period which could be renewed as long as the Iraqis continue to cooperate.

Western diplomats said the U.S.-British draft would lay out a tighter timetable to get Iraqi compliance and include new instructions for weapons inspectors. That could alter a deal Annan cut with the Iraqis in 1998 placing conditions on inspections of eight so-called "presidential sites." The deal was a sore spot for the previous inspection team, which was disbanded in December 1998 amid allegations that some members were spying for the United States.

But ambassadors said it was important to give chief weapons inspector Hans Blix time to do his job.

"We should concentrate on the return of Blix to Iraq. Two days after, if Blix says they're not cooperating, then we can take action. Right now, we don't see any need," said Mauritius' U.N. Ambassador Jagdish Koonjul.

Bill Porter was born and raised in Boulder, Colorado. He didn't like high school very much so he joined the Navy at the age of 16. After a stint in the service, he decided to follow his father's advice and go to school.

Mr. Porter graduated from Adams State College in Colorado. He then came to Kansas State where he earned a master's in physics. His master's thesis, "Infrared spectroscopy applied to the study of the autoxidation of di-iso-butyl ketone" was published in 1952. In 1967, after working at the National Bureau of Standards, General Electric, and Textron Corporation, he went to school at MIT.

Mr. Porter has been the creative genius behind more than 20 products and services, which include many electronic devices and products, and he holds 14 patents. One of his patents is for the first shoulder-mounted backpack broadcast color TV camera; others include the first electronic diesel-electric locomotive checkout system; the first infrared horizon sensor for satellite stabilization and several other breakthroughs that are still used today.

In 1982, he founded an electronic brokerage service for stockbrokers where the world's first online trading took place. Ten years later he realized he could compete with major brokerage houses and launched a subsidiary of Trade Plus now known as E*Trade - the leader in online investing. He most recently launched the International Securities Exchange (ISE) - the United States' first entirely electronic options market.

Mr. Porter is very modest about all of his achievements. He says, "I figured if I could live to be 150, maybe I'll know how to do it right," regarding the complex game of entrepreneurship. "There's always plenty more to learn."

Officials enforce drinking rules

Alcohol makes large crowds unmanageable

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Football fans can still tailgate, officials say, but they must be more responsible.

Jim Muller, manager of operations for the Department of Athletics, said tailgating goes hand-in-hand with the K-State football experience.

But at the last few games, tailgating crowds became unmanageable and so did the drinking.

The combination led to several fights, Muller said, and larger tailgates were infringing on the space of others. The tailgating tradition had to be protected, he said, and it had to be safe.

So, the athletic department worked in cooperation with the K-State Police to inform fans at last week's game of the rules and regulations regarding the possession and consumption of alcoholic liquor and cereal malt beverages.

"It's not something we want to do, to be out there going tailgate to tailgate telling people the rules," Muller said. "We've had a really well-organized tailgate environment for years and years here, and it's worth protecting because it's a really great time."

Bush asks Congress to approve use of force

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — President Bush asked Congress Thursday for authority to "use all means," including military force if necessary, to disarm and overthrow Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein if he does not quickly meet United Nations demands that he abandon all weapons of mass destruction.

At the U.N., Saddam delivered a defiant written message taunting the United States while claiming that Iraq has no chemical, biological or nuclear weapons — and saying he welcomed inspections.

Secretary of State Colin Powell said Saddam's latest statement itself represented a backing away from his earlier promise to grant weapons inspectors unfettered access.

The proposal Bush sent to Capitol Hill would give him broad war-making authority. "If you want to keep the peace, you've got to have the authorization to use force," he told reporters in the Oval Office.

The president worked to build support for a vote by Congress before lawmakers go home to campaign for the Nov. 5 elections, and legislative leaders said the vote could come in two weeks.

RCPD limiting noise

Returning students force authorities to respond

By Lynne Hermansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Noisy parties and students create headaches for area residents.

Since the beginning of the school year, more noise complaints have been filed than expected.

Mike Watson, Riley County Police Department director, said the complaints have mainly been coming from older people concerning Aggieville, loud parties and loud cars.

"If it's because they are more sensitive now since the summers are quieter, or if younger people have been louder than normal, I really don't know," he said.

Watson said noise problems in Manhattan have been occurring on and off for years.

"I think it partly has to do with it being back to school time," he said. "After October, for some reason, there is not as much noise."

The RCPD normally gives people a first warning about the complaint, but they cite them if they receive a second complaint.

"It is not how we like to do business," Watson said. "We don't like just going around arresting people all the time."

To better handle the increasing amount of complaints, Watson said the RCPD recently started handing out flyers to these neighborhoods, including those north of Aggieville, instead.

The flyer reminds residents of the city's noise ordinances. Any excessive, unnecessary or unusually loud noise that unreasonably annoys or disturbs another is prohibited.

The ordinance includes any audible noise, such as music, loud parties, people or loud vehicles up to 50 feet away between 11 p.m. and 7 a.m.

Watson said since school has started, RCPD has regularly received complaints at 2, 3 and 4 a.m.

"I think it is quite reasonable to ask for quiet at this time," he said. "We handed out flyers, because this isn't directed towards anyone, just everyone in general."

A first offense normally results in going to court and paying a fine. If a judge wants, he can fine a person up to $500 and give them 6 months in jail, but Watson said that most likely a judge would save that for a repeat offender. And if a house is disorderly, they can close down the house.

Watson said they are just trying to keep neighborhoods peaceful.

"We would rather have people be good neighbors and not upset people," he said.

DEBT WOES

College students that use credit cards sometimes have debt troubles. Overuse and high balances can result in students falling behind on payments.

Study finds students using credit more

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eddie Fishel uses his credit cards for most everything he needs.

When his TV went out, he used his credit card to buy a new one.

When he needs groceries or other necessities, he uses his credit card.

Even though he knows credit card use can lead to serious debt, Fishel, senior in mechanical engineering, isn't worried about the way he uses his cards.

"I haven't had any problems as far as being in extreme debt," he said. "I charge more than I can pay on my card in a month, but I haven't had any problems with them at all."

Fishel is part of the 83 percent of undergraduate college students nationwide who have at least one credit card, according to a study published in April by Nellie Mae.

According to the study, more under-

Warning signs

Kim Rebel, certified credit counselor, offers some warning signs for students to determine if they are in over their heads with their creditors

- If you are paying only minimum payments.
- Each month your credit card balance gets higher
- If you are paying bills late or missing payments
- If you frequently use overdraft privilege or cash advances
- If you are using credit cards to pay monthly bills
- If you are receiving calls from creditors
- If you are dependent on savings accounts or have no savings account
- If you begin taking out loans to pay older loans graduate college students are carrying credit cards than ever before. The percentage of students that have at least one card has gone up 24 percent since 1998.

Kim Rebel, a certified credit counselor for the Consumer Credit Counseling Service, said using credit cards can be one way to build good credit, but many college students who use them have overextended limits, high balances and end up falling behind on payments.

She said she suggests people only use credit cards for emergency uses.

"I always tell people if you can eat it, wear it or drink it, it is not an emergency," Rebel said.

Rebel said her office serves people from all around Riley county, but about one-fourth of the people who come in to her office are K-State students.

"That doesn't sound like a lot, but it is," she said.

Nellie Mae found that 21 percent of undergraduates who have cards have balance levels between $3,000 and $7,000, a 61 percent increase from the 2000 study population.

Rebel said she believes one way many students achieve high balances is by using their cards on spring break trips. She said a $1,000 trip at a 15.9 percent interest rate, making only minimum payments, will take 15 1/2 years to pay off. She also said that the $1,000 trip will turn into a $2,329 trip with the interest rates.

"I use those numbers as a wake-up call for some students," she said.

Even though there are high rates of students with high credit card balances, Nellie Mae found that the average credit card debt per student has fallen from $2,748 in 2000 to $2,327 in 2001.

Jeanne Waller, junior in kinesiology, said she uses her credit cards for many reasons and has charged some expensive things to her card she couldn't pay for right away.

Student Senate takes steps toward smoother elections

Expanded changes, revised voting methods expected in future

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Senate took measures to ensure that the spring elections run smoothly, without the mistakes of last year, through legislation passed at Thursday evening's meeting.

First, a bill was passed allowing voters the ability to write in candidates equal to the number of positions available for that particular office.

The bill also included a ruling by Student Tribunal last year, which prohibited the use of write-in candidates for general elections in the office of student body president and vice president. Write-ins are allowed for this office in the primary election only.

A second elections regulation change regarding randomization of names on the ballot was passed after lengthy debate. The bill called for candidates' names to be listed on the ballot in an order determined by drawing of numbers at mandatory election meetings.

Although this change eliminates the use of numerous versions of a randomized ballot, Bill Harlan, Senate operations committee chair, said the new process will be just as fair at a more reasonable cost.

The technicians programming the online voting system described randomization as very technically challenging, he said.

Senators expressed concerns that with a predetermined order, candidates placed at the bottom of the list would be at a disadvantage.

"We are looking at placing names in columns across the screen," Harlan said. "Their goal is to minimize scrolling, but hopefully we can eliminate that with columns. There are so many approaches to voting. The placement doesn't matter."

OPEC rejects West's call to boost oil output, but pledges to pump more if price exceeds target

OPEC ministers decided Thursday to keep oil production levels unchanged through the year's end, despite calls from the West for more output and fears a U.S. war on Iraq could disrupt supplies. Consuming nations had lobbied for an increase in output to cut rising fuel bills. PAGE 8

Bush endorses Homeland Security alternative as Senate showdown looms

Senate Democrats and Republicans remained at an impasse Thursday over worker rights in the proposed Homeland Security Department as President Bush endorsed a new alternative. The alternative makes some modest concessions to Democrats on the crucial issues of civil service and union protections. Senate committee passes new aviation security steps

A Senate committee on Thursday passed additional measures to tighten aviation security while also extending the year-end deadline for some airports to screen all passenger bags for explosives. But the security steps might not become law because Congress could run out of time to act this year. PAGE 9

Coup attempt fails in Ivory Coast; interior minister, former junta leader killed

Loyalist troops put down an uprising by security forces who attacked military and police bases across the Ivory Coast Thursday, trying to oust the president while he was visiting Italy. The Cabinet minister in charge of police was killed along with the former junta leader accused of having a role in the uprising. PAGE 9

Wireless cards impressive to students

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Building by building, K-State is expanding its wireless technology.

Harvard Townsend, director of Computing and Network Services, said wireless Internet connections allow notebook computers Internet access with wireless cards.

Multiple buildings on campus have access, Townsend said, and Hale Library now has access on all four public access floors.

Thirteen notebook computers with the capability are available to students and faculty to check out, he said.

Townsend said K-State plans to have the entire campus covered with access points, but with budget constraints his department can only install them a few at a time. He said access points recently were added to Umberger Hall on Sept. 9.

"I've heard there's increasing use of the wireless notebook computers in Hale," he said. "As more and more people learn about it, I'm sure it will become more popular."

Josh Wells, senior in television and radio, first checked out a wireless Internet card in Hale Library last spring.

He said he was impressed with the speed of the connection, and decided to purchase his own two weeks ago.

Wells said he uses his wireless Internet every day because of the convenience.

"Wireless Internet is going to catch on among students once they find out what it is," he said. "It could really contribute to students who want to use their laptop computers and work on homework."

A closer look

Many of the issues at K-State also affect some of America's other universities. Campus Connection offers a side-by-side view at how some of them are addressed here and at other schools.

USC students split about new network

By Kenneth Basin
DAILY TROJAN

LOS ANGELES — Among University of Southern California professors and students alike, response to the Information Services Division's new wireless data network have been mixed.

The wireless Internet access, which is available in common areas, eateries, University Village and on the Row, was funded by a $460,000 grant from Enterasys Networks. Data is transferred on the network via packetized radio waves.

"Packetized means there is a packet of information, which would consist of a header that says who it's headed for, where it's going, and then it's received and decoded," said A. Michael Noll, professor of communication. "It's like an envelope with an address on it saying who it's intended for."

Noll said he is skeptical of the new technology's applications at USC.

One of his concerns is traffic on the network — multiple users seeking bandwidth slows down the entire network and can sometimes block others from accessing it at all.

"Just like a conversation, if you go to talk and someone else goes to talk at the same time, you collide," Noll said.

Because of this, wireless Internet access is unlikely to replace wired systems, he said.

In addition, there are significant security issues associated with transmitting information on a radio spectrum since it can be picked up by anyone.

"Relying on so-called complexity in the technology as a form of security never works," Noll said.

Beyond technical issues, however, Noll questioned the usefulness and worth of the new wireless systems.

"Who cares how it works?" he said.

"The real issue is what are you going to use it for and what are going to be the humanistic implications of those uses?"

Matt Slocum, junior in jazz studies, also worried about the frivolity and usefulness of the new network.

"Only if you're hardcore, wireless Internet might be for you," he said.

Fans continue crowd-surfing tradition at games

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students never have done it this much, this early.

At least not during K-State football games.

With the Wildcats scoring at an unprecedented pace — 179 points through three games — fans have had plenty of opportunities to perfect the time-honored tradition of crowd surfing at KSU Stadium.

It's one of many weekly duties students have passed through generations to establish K-State as one of the most rowdy and enjoyable atmospheres in college football.

"I'm overwhelmed with the electricity that students provide in our football stadium," said Casey Scott, associate athletic director in charge of operations.

"They come early, they're standing in line before the gates open to get to the best seats, the east side is packed, and they're rocking."

And when they aren't rocking, they are surfing — crowd surfing, or riding horizontally across a wave of hands over a section of the stadium.

"It's not really a choice — two people just grab your legs, and you just go up," Julie Studer, freshman in business, said.

Studer rode the wave of student arms after Terence Newman broke free for a 95-yard kickoff return in the first quarter of the Cats' win over Eastern Illinois last Saturday.

"You have to stay stiff so they don't grab you," she said, "and you just go all the way up. It was smooth."

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN

Willie the Wildcat surfs through the crowd in the student section at the Louisiana-Monroe football game on Sept. 7.

Studer, whose small frame is best suited for crowd surfing, might have had an easy go, but for heavier students, it's not so easy.

Tyler Ryan, sophomore in secondary education, knows that lesson firsthand. After one K-State touchdown in particular, Ryan's friend might have overestimated his friend's strength in a rush to join the festivities.

"He got real excited after a score, so he told me to just throw him up there," Ryan said.

"I struggled a little bit and had to have another couple guys help me. But we threw him up there, and they just started carrying him up."

While it's tough to goof up a crowd surf, there are ways to ensure a successful ride.

It's much like a rock star diving off the stage at a concert — being on top of the crowd is a must.

A boost from a buddy is usually better received than climbing up a person's back, some said. The rest is easy — stay stiff like a board and have a good time.

Surfs don't always go smoothly. Students often don't make it to the top of the section — some wind up losing a shoe or keys.

But when done right and coupled with other K-State traditions, Scott said, it makes KSU Stadium a great place to watch football.

"Our fans have so much pride in the institution and in the team," he said. "It truly is the thing to do. They live for it, and that's what makes it so fun."

"There are great student bodies in other places, but ours are as enthusiastic and into the game and smart about the game as any others I've ever been around."

Thousands expected at city folk festival this weekend

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Little Apple Festival might not be so little.

More than 8,000 people are expected to attend the weekend event that features folk life, food, and arts and crafts.

"We usually have quite a turnout," said Melanie Godsey, recreations supervisor for the city of Manhattan. "If the weather is nice, and it looks like it will be, we should expect the same type of crowd."

The 27th annual celebration will be from 11 a.m. to 8 p.m. Saturday and 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Sunday in City Park. The event is free and open to the public.

The festival's main attraction is the folk life area that features historical displays. This year, there will be a medieval jousting re-enactment, Native American storytelling and quilting demonstrations.

"It is really the coolest part of the festival," Godsey said. "Different vendors come in and put on live educational, historical demonstrations. It is really neat to see."

A children's area, complete with pony rides, inflatable attractions and a make-it-and-take-it craft station, also is a draw to the festival, Godsey said.

New to the event is a main stage act. Dave Bailey, from Chicago, and Lee McBee,

"We are hoping for a big turnout for the show because they are both wonderful blues artists," Godsey said. "It coincides with the football game, but this will give people an alternative source of entertainment."

A variety of food and several craft vendors also will be at the festival.

"It is a great family event because there is so many things to do," Godsey said, "but I also really think students would enjoy it."

TO THE POINT Communication key to peaceful neighborhoods

Noise in a college town is inevitable. Aggieville night life and house parties usually are the cause of it.

The Riley County Police Department has started handing out flyers to residents around campus and Aggieville reminding them of noise ordinances. The ordinances state that excessive or unusually loud noise that annoys or disturbs others is prohibited.

Although we agree that students need to respect residents living near them, other residents need to be understanding that areas near Aggieville will often generate a loud night life.

Students need to keep in mind that getting a little loud and crazy is OK, but not to the extent where it is disrupting other people's lives.

Many residents are generally not up as late as students are.

At the same time, residents need to be more accepting of noise, especially on the weekends and in neighborhoods where students are living.

Residents have the right to live where they choose, but they need to be aware of which neighborhoods will produce the most noise, and judge accordingly.

Know your neighbors, respect each other and learn to compromise in order to gain a peaceful neighborhood.

TRANSFORMATIONS

Acceptance, not change, should be embraced more

KENNIS LOOK

There's a world of difference between helping a loved one cope with a destructive habit and adjusting someone's personal habits to better suit yours.

Is it OK to change your personal habits for someone you care about?

Some might argue that to love someone is to want the best for them.

There are those who succumb to such "encouragement" from their significant others.

What gives any of us the right to change another human being because we feel they could be better? Oh sure, there's the old song and dance that if you do in fact love someone, you want to become a better person for them.

But this old Jerry McGuireism only yields success when it's the individual's own initiative to change the habit and improve.

Believe me, I've seen it. He or she might claim they've quit smoking, for instance. But I've seen friends stomach handfuls of mints and gum to cover up a freshly devoured Marlboro, all just to avoid the disappointed soulmate's shrill accusations.

In the words of "Saturday Night Live's" Stuart Smalley, "I'm good enough. I'm smart enough. And doggonnit, people like me."

These aren't just words, people. It's not about you, darling. I've always cracked my knuckles. It's who I am. If you love me, you have to love my arthritis-ridden joints, too.

What's more is, so often, couples meet at parties or social gatherings in which either or both of these young lovers is drinking, smoking, biting their fingernails, picking their noses and what have you. This is the opportunity to scope out the situation and get a glimpse of every-one's array of quirks.

Be selective before you snare an unsuspecting scab-picker. Don't overlook flaws if it's so big a deal you can't live with it later on.

And granted, there are some deal-breaking habits that just need to be changed. Whether they are acquired during a relationship or hidden from the beginning, it's certainly important to help a loved one through alcoholism, drug abuse or closet Hall & Oates listening.

Naturally, you can't help everyone, and frankly, some people discover the more they learn about each other, the more they just aren't compatible.

Attempting to change people in order to restore compatibility is illogical and would deprive them of their individuality.

If a person's habits aren't working with you, there are two options: Learn to enjoy the richness in every special person you meet. If this is impossible, it's up to you to realize whether this habit is something that inhibits your friend's personal growth, or if it is simply something your mother designated as inappropriate behavior at the dinner table.

I myself am a coping nail-biter. My obsessive-compulsive girlfriend is learning to touch me again. But more importantly, I'm going to consider stopping. Whatever she might think, though, I'm doing it for me.

I just can't make that great scraping noise against chalkboards without fingernails.

Mutual self-sacrifice leads to successful relationships

I know I already have one mark against me in the self-sacrifice argument.

Being a girl, it is expected of me that I support the idea of changing myself for someone I love. Well, I am not about to promote the idea of whipping all men into relationships, or vice versa.

I hope to reinforce the tried and true old saying that relationships are a matter of give and take — always in that order, too.

To maintain any relationship worth maintaining, both persons need to practice self-sacrifice. Of course, this phrase can be given as easy advice, but things become much more complicated when two real people are involved.

At the core of these complications lies the different ways men and women define selfishness. For such an explanation, I am going to borrow the wisdom of the great C.S. Lewis. In his book, "The Screwtape Letters," Lewis distinguishes the differing perspectives as, "A woman means by selfishness chiefly taking trouble for others, a man means not giving trouble to others."

This theory would play into a modern relationship as something like this: the female feels she is doing her fair share of "giving" to the relationship by running her boyfriend's errands, etc. The male feels he is contributing his part to the relationship by biting his tongue so as not to hurt his girlfriend's feelings, and respecting her rights as an individual.

If you haven't guessed the conflict already, the female expects her boyfriend to express his "unselfishness" just as she does because she can't recognize his natural expressions of love.

So, am I suggesting women should be content with men as they are, and men should be content with women no matter how they are?

Please, I would only say that if I was plotting the extinction of my species.

The point I am driving at is all females and males need to alter their perspectives about changing for a loved one. We need to reevaluate the way we define "give and take" in a relationship.

For example, to all the women out there who whip their men into behaving like sharing, feeling pseudo-girlfriends, maybe you could try understanding their definitions of selfishness. The challenge is to have our definitions meet in the middle of taking away trouble, not giving it to others.

Don't hesitate to kick a bad habit for someone you love. Likewise, if the love is truly returned, the favor will be, too.

However, with this advice I also give warning: A distinction needs to be made between healthy and unhealthy change—a distinction determined by motives. Ask yourself why you would want to change the person you love. Healthy change can only be motivated by our desire to see the people we love better their character for their benefit, not ours.

Promoting healthy change in relationships is again another act of unselfishness.

Hopefully we know the other person well enough to determine his or her motives, but we also know humans are capable of deceiving themselves to get what they want.

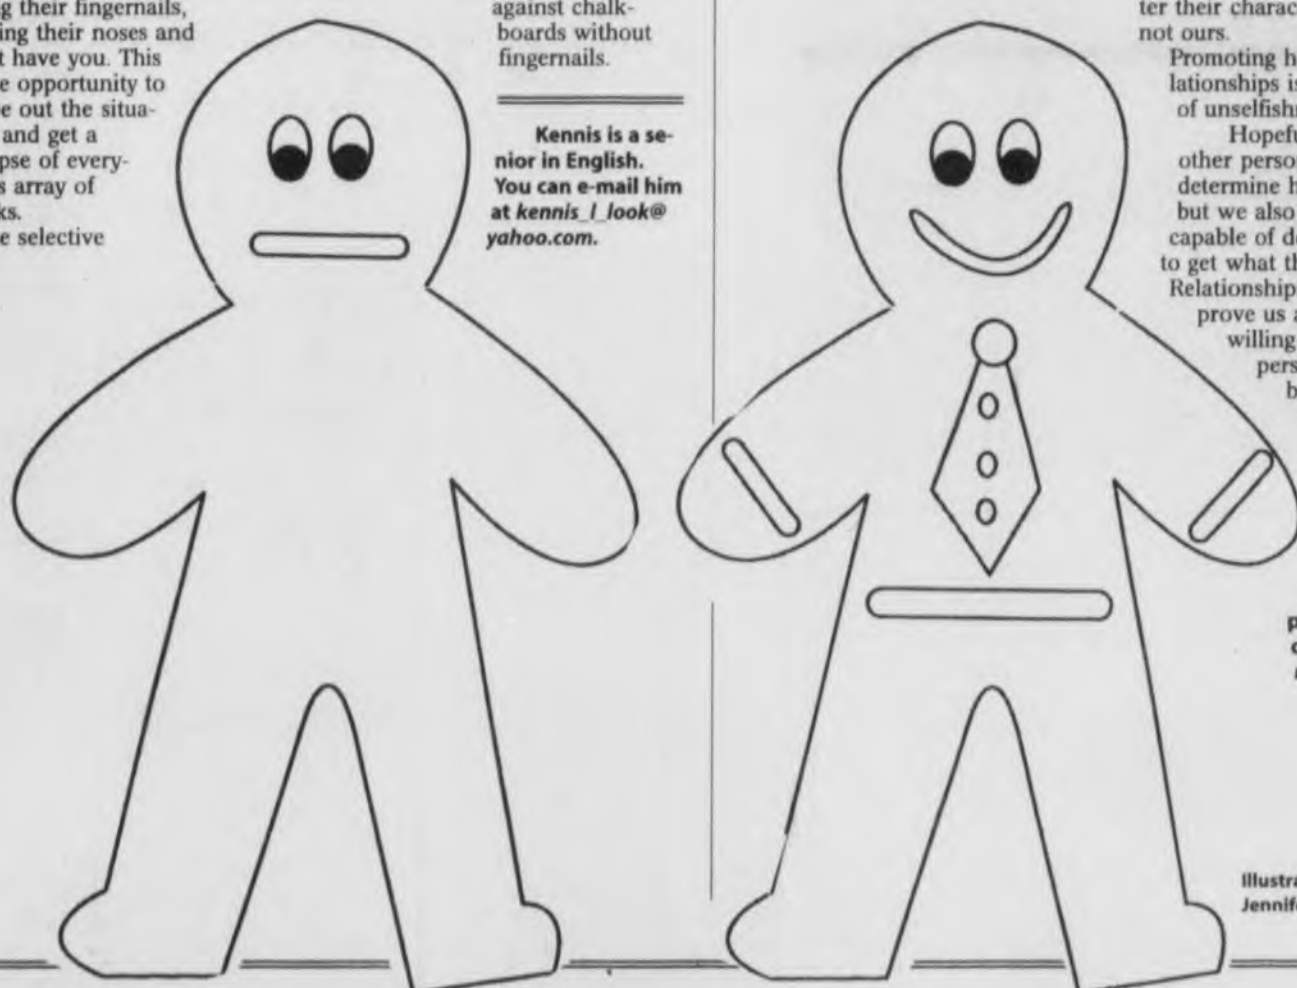

Relationships are meant to improve us as individuals. Be willing to change for the person who has your best interests at heart, and don't neglect to examine your own motives.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

Micah Hawkinson and Kathryn Hollingsworth obviously didn't have the same writing instructors. You know they sell manuals on how to construct and write an argument? Kathryn would do well to buy, borrow or steal one of them.

Hey, Micah Hawkinson, I'm part of this nation's military, and I like the fact that they spend so much money on us. That's how I can afford to go to school, to eat and to live here. As for the homeless, you can tell them that McDonald's is always hiring.

Before we rush to bomb Baghdad, we should remember that Saddam Hussein wouldn't have so many biological, chemical and traditional weapons now if the United States hadn't provided them to Iraq during the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and George the first.

When I saw the title of Thursday's front-page article, I thought it was going to be girls talking about frat guys in bed.

All right. Go, K-State Aviation. We made the front page.

To Mr. Mark Maston: I am a student and also a tax payer. Since I give my tax dollars and $2,000 of my own money every semester to K-State, if I see fit to skip a class, guess what — I can. It's my prerogative, so get over it.

Yes, this is a call from the IT Helpdesk. I'd just like to let you know that we normally don't answer the phone when we have a customer standing in front of us. Thanks.

For $2,500 a semester, I'll skip class whenever I want. As a matter of fact, I'm doing it right now.

How about some lemonade vendors at the games?

To whoever said they hate the Fourum: The Fourum is the best part of the Collegian. Why don't you just not read it.

To the guy who called in about the goal posts: grow some stones, man. We haven't ripped one down in five years. If we beat USC, those things are coming down.

This is to the person who thinks our official language is English: I'm sorry, but you're mistaken, and your view of this world is as destructive as it is narrow.

Forget about just e-mail. What about the total lack of bandwidth in the dorms?

People who call your house over and over again after midnight should burn in a big pile of mashed potatoes. I'm tired.

Barb Robel, you are not God. You need to learn your role.

K-State's budget didn't actually get cut. They're just paying to bail the football players out of jail.

Layton Ehmke: Way to be productive with your thoughts. I think you proposed an excellent solution.

If you take Dead Lemon and change the first two letters, it's Lead Demon.

Layton Ehmke needs to be taken to the wood shed and have a lesson given to him.

Who else thinks Barb Robel needs to be thrown out of office?

The next comic selection we have should be one about Ralphie from the Simpsons.

Christine, this is John from the football game. Remember, you wore my jacket in the rain? Meet me at the Union coffee shop at 5 p.m. on Friday.

If Paul White and Barb Robel had a baby, we would all be seriously in trouble.

I've been using college-ruled paper my entire life. What's the other kind of paper, high school-ruled?

K-State campus — the only place where 25,000 students walk by each other without saying a word.

Micah Hawkinson, will you marry me?

Why should the bikers have to look out for the pedestrians? We can see you just fine. Why don't you guys turn around and look out for us and maybe we won't run you over?

For all the football-bashing losers out there: See you at the game on Saturday.

Great, the cable just went out. Now what are college students supposed to do?

I take Mr. Ehmke is a little upset because they don't make a No Fear bong-hits T-shirt. That's what it sounds like to me.

To the person who called in about the girls at the Rec: You talk like cheeks are a bad thing.

School sucks. I haven't been to class all week. My roommate has serious issues. Is this a problem?

Harleys and football — is there a better marriage? I submit there is not.

What the hell are those tubas doing out in the parking lot at 10:30 on a Wednesday night?

To the guy who didn't give me a pompon at the volleyball game: You're really mean.

Coaches give back to community, learn life skills

Students make up majority of coaches in Manhattan league for 3rd, 4th graders

By James Huria
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Michelle Watson wanted to return some of what she had received.

Watson, freshman in fine arts, has played soccer since she was 5, but stopped playing competitively after high school.

When she came to K-State, Watson decided to turn her efforts to coaching a youth league for the Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation.

She now is coaching a group of third and fourth grade girls whose team name is 'Dynamo.'

"If you can't play, you might as well coach," she said. "It's a good way to stay involved."

Coaching is a way to return all the support she got from her father and coaches, Watson said.

Watson said she played enough soccer to know what she is doing as a coach, although she is mostly teaching her team the basics.

"It's easier with younger girls because they're just starting out," she said.

Wynn Conover, who coaches a group of second grade girls, the Zips, agreed coaching young children doesn't require a lot of strategy, but said it does require patience and creativity.

"The hardest part is figuring out how to teach younger kids," Conover, senior in marketing, said. "It's hard to come up with fun drills that aren't too difficult."

The attention spans of many of the children present a difficult obstacle for Conover to overcome.

"We can't spend more than five minutes on any one drill," she said.

Top: Michelle Watson, freshman in fine arts, gives her teammates a talk during halftime of their soccer game. The team is made up of third and fourth graders. Watson coaches to give back to the community some of what she learned from her soccer coaches. While coaching children with very little experience has its challenges, Conover said the experience is fulfilling.

"It's fun because they're all there to have fun and play," she said. "It doesn't have to be too serious."

College students make up a large part of the soccer coaches for parks and recreation, said Adam Dolezal, recreation supervisor at the parks and recreation.

Many parents would like to help, Dolezal said, but most don't know enough about soccer to coach. He said college students offer a good knowledge base about the sport, in addition to providing other benefits.

"Students have the ability to relate with kids," Dolezal said.

"Not that they're really close in age, but it gives it an older brother or older sister feel."

Dolezal said the students' coaching is rewarding for the students and the teams. He said coaching is an opportunity for students to learn responsibility.

Watson said she has been enjoying her coaching experience, but she's not doing it for herself.

"The most important thing is for the girls to have fun and for it to be a good experience," she said.

Store owner declares fashion show successful

Event helps promote Aggieville store, entertain students

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Deeke Nolan had never been to a fashion show before Thursday afternoon, when he attended the fashion show sponsored by Zotci's in the K-State Student Union.

"It's different," Nolan, junior in management information systems, said. "I don't think I'd be able to fit in any of their dresses, but they have very good looking clothes."

Nolan said he heard about the show from reading the Collegian during his lunch break and decided to stay in the Union to watch before class.

"I think the fashion show went well," Sarah Strothman, Zotci's store owner, said. "It's my first experience doing a fashion show but it was lots of fun - stressful, but fun."

Strothman graduated in December 2001 in apparel and textile marketing. Zotci's opened in Aggieville in March 2002.

Ester Wiechen, Zotci's advertising manager, said the store wanted to put on a show to get its name out.

"Our store is very different from what a lot of clothing stores are like in Kansas," she said. "We wanted to show what we carry and what is coming out for this fall. People are afraid to get out of the norm, and we wanted to show them another option that will allow them to express themselves."

The show started 15 minutes late due to security concerns left on some of the clothing.

The total cost of the event for Zotci's approximated $500. Renting the Union was $200 of that total, which included the T-shaped runway.

The Apparel Marketing Design Alliance co-sponsored the event with Zotci's. Hair Experts Design Team cut and styled all of the models' hair and did their makeup.

Wiechen said the alliance did about $150 worth of work on each model.

Jessica Ford, freshman in elementary education, modeled in the show and said AMDA was very accommodating.

"Whenever we told them we could come, they were there and worked around our schedules," she said.

Select Sound also volunteered to be a part of the event.

Nick Agbaer was the DJ and enticed students during lunchtime to the first floor of the Union with a loud mixture of pop and R&B music.

Chris Legler, who was originally going to be a model in the show, was the emcee.

"The designer of Clue couldn't make it, so I was the model turned emcee," he said.

The show divided into three themed sections: Seattle, Kansas City and New York.

The Seattle section featured vintage-inspired clothing, and the Kansas City part featured casual jeans clothing.

During the last section of the show, New York, models displayed black fashions with gothic-type style.

Many models were students who were asked to model because they are regular shoppers at Zotci's. Others were recruited differently.

Sarah Dyer, freshman in political science, said she was recruited in the residence halls.

"I was coming off the elevator in Ford Hall and Sarah chased after me and asked if I would do this for her," she said. "I said sure."

Michelle Márquez, senior in elementary education, was shopping at Zotci's when an employee asked her if she was interested in modeling.

"It was more fun than time consuming," she said. "I was really excited to do it. We had meetings and a dress rehearsal, and the last time we met we had a little party."

Many of the models said they enjoyed the experience.

"All these people were here that I knew," Dyer said.

"It was a lot of fun and a good experience. It'll be something that I'll look back on."

Thank God the Fourum is back. I have been paying $2.95 a minute to confess to Miss Cleo all summer.

Bill Porter was born and raised in Boulder, Colorado. He didn't like high school very much so he joined the Navy at the age of 16. After a stint in the service, he decided to follow his father's advice and go to school.

Mr. Porter graduated from Adams State College in Colorado. He then came to Kansas State where he earned a master's in physics. His master's thesis, "Infrared spectroscopy applied to the study of the autooxidation of di-iso-butyl ketone" was published in 1952. In 1967, after working at the National Bureau of Standards, General Electric, and Textron Corporation, he went to school at MIT.

Mr. Porter has been the creative genius behind more than 20 products and services, which include many electronic devices and products, and he holds 14 patents. One of his patents is for the first shoulder-mounted backpack broadcast color TV camera; others include the first electronic diesel-electric locomotive checkout system; the first infrared horizon sensor for satellite stabilization and several other breakthroughs that are still used today.

In 1982, he founded an electronic brokerage service for stockbrokers where the world's first online trading took place. Ten years later he realized he could compete with major brokerage houses and launched a subsidiary of Trade Plus now known as E-Trade - the leader in online investing. He most recently launched the International Securities Exchange (ISE) - the United States' first entirely electronic options market.

Mr. Porter is very modest about all of his achievements. He says, "I figured if I could live to be 150, maybe I'll know how to do it right," regarding the complex game of entrepreneurship. "There's always plenty more to learn."

Ewing: It's the right time

NBA legend had moments;
skills faded late

By Colby Gordon
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An event that was supposed to happen five years ago finally happened this past week —

Patrick Ewing retired from basketball.

Ewing has not been an effective NBA center since the mid 1990's and was a hindrance to the New York Knicks during their run to the finals in 1999.

Anyone who watches basketball knew Ewing should not have been on the court these past few years, but sometimes the only person who doesn't realize that is the player himself.

Thankfully, Ewing came to the conclusion it was time to go, watching him sit the bench and hobble the floor in another uniform would not have only been sad, but close to pathetic.

Ewing looked ridiculous these past two seasons donning Seattle Supersonics and Orlando Magic jerseys. Ewing will always be a Knick, but unfortunately our last images of him are sitting on the bench in a Magic uniform. Ewing was a great player, but perhaps will be remembered for all the things he didn't do, such as beat Michael Jordan during a meaningful playoff series (excluding the series where Jordan just came back from baseball and was out of shape) or bring a championship to New York.

Ewing also will be remembered for ridiculous statements such as when he guaranteed victory in game 7 of the finals against Houston, and then failed to back it up. And he said one of the worst things ever: "We make a lot of money, but we spend a lot of money," during the NBA lockout. He said it was one of the reasons why the NBA players wanted more money from the owners.

Switching from NBA ridiculousness, to the NFL's absurdities, Dick Vermeil gave us our weekly ridiculous statement from the Kansas City Chiefs.

On Tuesday, Vermeil said, "Elvis Grbac would be our quarterback today, if he had stayed here. He put us in a situation that we didn't have a lot of options — I was perfectly willing to go with Elvis Grbac. He had a good year."

Excuse me? I'm assuming he's referring to the same Grbac that said (paraphrase) "I can't throw and catch the ball."

When the Chiefs traded for Trent Green, Vermeil acted as if Green was the next Joe Namath. Now, after one bad game, Vermeil implies the Chiefs would have been better off keeping Grbac.

Vermeil only has himself to blame for that move — he was the one that wanted Green.

I know Green played superb last year, and played terribly last Sunday, but he still needs the confidence of his coach, at least in public.

Going into New England to play arguably the NFL's best defense, Green needs the backing of his coach, because most fans and the media are down on him.

And don't worry, we can all count on another ridiculous statement by someone in the Chiefs organization next week.

Another thing that might help the Chiefs' offense is better play calling by offensive coordinator Al Saunders.

Memo to Al — when you have Tony Gonzalez, Priest Holmes and Johnnie Morton, don't bother giving the ball to Mike Cloud, Dante Hall or Jason Dunn.

Gonzalez and Morton had five receptions last Sunday. That is not enough. Get the ball to your playmakers.

Volleyball tries to snap 4-game skid

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After playing Nebraska to open conference play, the volleyball team is confident they won't face a much better opponent the rest of the season.

And with K-State's match with Baylor (6-4, 0-1) this weekend, the Cats (4-5, 0-1) are focused on getting a Big 12 win, then building on it for the rest of the season.

The Cats lead the all-time series with the Bears 9-4, including a 4-2 series edge in matches played in Waco, Texas.

Last season, the Wildcats swept Baylor in three games for the first time ever.

It was one of six wins the Cats earned on the road last year, a total K-State wants to improve on, outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said.

"That's one thing we want to focus on this season, and that's getting better on the road," Pollard said.

"The tournament last weekend, playing three really good teams on the road, will help us tremendously down the road in the Big 12."

K-State dropped all three matches in the South Florida tournament last weekend, then lost to No. 5 Nebraska on Wednesday.

Despite the four-match losing streak, the longest since the Cats dropped five in a row in 1997, Pollard said the competition the team faced in Florida will help the team against some of the top teams in the league.

"Those teams can for the most part beat any team in the Big 12," Pollard said. "That prepared us for Baylor and the other teams in the conference."

If K-State hopes to have success against the Bears, they will have to block better than they did Wednesday against Nebraska.

The Cats had just one block against the Huskers, which tied the lowest total for a match in school history.

The last time K-State had one block in a match was in 1993 against Washington State.

But the Cats hope the road opener will be the end of their losing streak, and the continuation of their success away from Manhattan to begin Big 12 play.

K-State is 5-2 in league openers since the inception of the conference in 1996. Last season, though, the Cats lost their road opener to Texas Tech.

Conference road opening success, or not, the Cats just want to get a win.

K-State hasn't dipped below the .500 mark after more than two matches since 1993, when they started the season with a record of 3-6.

Wildcats to see tough conditions in 2nd event

Michigan tourney's course structure to make players work for low scores

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Wildcats will face tough competition at the Mary Fossom Invitational golf tournament this weekend in East Lansing, Mich.

Three top-25 programs will be in attendance, setting a competitive field of quality players. Added to that, the course will be one of the toughest the Cats will play this season.

Junior Christine Boucher should know. She has played the course twice and knows she will need more patience and consistency in her strokes.

"It is a narrow, longer course. It is as difficult as Colbert Hills and it has more trees," she said. "It is a tough, tough course."

"I just want to go and play the game that I know I can play. I'm going to try to beat my own score and not try to beat the other players."

Coach Kristi Knight said patience is something the whole team will work on.

The Wildcats last competed at the Husker Invitational, where they finished in a third-place tie. Knight said the team traveled to Lincoln, Neb., expecting to win, but had a rough first round.

"We had a lot of big numbers," Knight said. "Miranda (Smith) had more doubles than she would like to have, and Christine had a great final round, but had one hole that hurt her. She ended up placing third individually."

That's where the team could use a little more patience — to control double-bogies, she said.

"Patience is knowing when to shoot at the pin or to shoot for the center of the green," Knight said. "It's not bad to be in the fat part of the green. If you take aim at a competitive pin, you'll be in a tough position to put it up and in."

Boucher said she hopes to hit the ball more consistently this weekend, but her strategy in her approach shots to the green will depend on if her game is clicking.

"If I'm struggling, I'm going to play more conservative to save par," she said. "But if I'm playing well, I will be more aggressive."

Equestrian team to feel out new zone this weekend

By Brent Gray
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State equestrian team will see some unfamiliar faces at the first show of the year in Springfield, Mo., when they compete in the Southwest Missouri State University Western Show.

The squad will show for the first time in the air new zone — Zone 7 Region 2.

"I'm not expecting a lot from this first show," Coach Lindsay Breidenthal said. "I would like to see us finish in the first or second slot overall as a team. But I won't be disappointed if we don't."

One of the biggest aspects K-State riders will deal with is their nerves, she said.

"The nerves will be flying high there," Breidenthal said. "We really don't know what we're getting ourselves into."

The timing of the show has the Cats a little blind sided, she said.

"We are a little rushed heading into this show," Breidenthal said. "We only had 10 days to practice so things were a little crazy."

Coming off their second season as a varsity sport, the equestrian squad is looking to draw more attention to itself by improving on last year's good showing.

The squad sent four individuals to the International Horse Show Association National Championships. Headlined by Brandi Vogel, who won the first ever National Championship by a K-State rider.

This year's squad has some familiar faces as 34 riders returned to make the cut, equally divided between the Western and English teams. The Wildcats had more than 150 riders who battled it out for the 59 available spots.

The riders who will compete at this weekend show are experienced, and that remains an area of comfort, Breidenthal said.

"The fact that I am starting some experienced riders at the show eases some of my worries," she said.

Competing in the new zone for the first time the team will also deal with horses in which they are not familiar with.

The host team provides the horses, which leaves riders no knowledge of what to expect, Breidenthal said.

"The girls have been practicing on light-sided horses," she said. "They just need to handle the horses lighter and be more aware with what's going on underneath them."

MLB | Things get physical at Kauffman

Two bare-chested fans ran out onto the field in the top of the ninth inning Thursday night and attacked Tom Gamboa, first-base coach for the Kansas City Royals.

After Michael Tucker grounded out to the pitcher for one out, two unidentified fans tackled Gamboa and began punching him. The Royals entire dugout cleared and their bullpen rushed in from the right-field bullpen, with several players jumping on the fans.

Punches were exchanged, but it wasn't clear which players threw them. Security came on the field and tried to break it up, but it was several minutes before order was restored.

The two fans were escorted off the field in handcuffs and a White Sox trainer attended to Gamboa. He had a large cut on his forehead and was holding a towel to his face, but he walked off the field under his own power.

Four Emporia State athletic greats of yesteryear will be inducted into the State of Kansas Sports Hall of Fame next month.

Al Feuerbach, a three-time Olympian and former world-record holder in the shot put, heads the list along with running back Brian Shay, former men's basketball coach Ron Slaymaker and volleyball and track star Kathy Lou Devine.

The four will be inducted into the Hall of Fame on Oct. 12 during a breakfast ceremony at the Emporia State Memorial Union preceding Emporia State's football game against Pittsburg State.

Daniel Cobb threw three touchdown passes in the second quarter and Camell Williams rushed for two TDs in the fourth as Auburn beat Mississippi State 42-14 Thursday night.

Cobb was 1-of-9 in the first quarter for the Tigers (3-1, 2-1 Southeastern Conference), who have won three straight.

The senior, who has had an up-and-down career, also caught an early break when an interception returned for a touchdown by Mississippi State was nullified when the play was blown dead because of an Auburn penalty.

But Cobb settled down and finished 10-of-21 for a season-high 183 yards with no interceptions.

THE ART OF TAILGATING

KSU games mean more than just football for students

By Renee McDaniel
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Beer, food and purple pride top the list of essentials for one group of Wildcat tailgaters.

John Bornholdt and his tailgating crew have taken the tradition beyond fun. It has become an essential part of life for the football fanatics.

For Bornholdt and the rest of his tailgating crew, gameday is the focal point of every fall weekend.

Bornholdt plans to attend every away game this year, and he has been as far as the University of Southern California to watch the team play.

The game isn't the only part of gameday for this pack of avid fans. The atmosphere and build-up of the sporting event are also important.

One of the dominant elements in that atmosphere is alcohol. Anymore, Bornholdt said the group doesn't bother bringing a grill or food since they have made friends with another group of tailgaters that always has plenty of food to trade for cash or beer.

"We usually pack about eight coolers of alcohol into Pure Vanilla," he said.

That's no cooking ingredient he's talking about — it's the group's beloved van.

"The van is top notch," Bornholdt said. "This is its sixth year at K-State. Pure Vanilla has been to Nebraska and Oklahoma. It has 432,000 miles, and it has never broken down," he said.

A couple of Bornholdt's friends started the tradition with the van.

"It's everybody's little baby. We all take our fair share of putting money in when it needs it," Bornholdt said.

Ben McClure, junior in agronomy, is the proud owner of Pure Vanilla.

"I bought it from our friends that had graduated for $100, but really it is everyone's, not just mine," he said.

Getting together with friends is a big part of tailgating for McClure.

"Seeing everyone come back to visit and hang out, that is the best," he said.

The tailgating party doesn't stop when the cats leave town.

Bornholdt said he and his friends all load up in Pure Vanilla for the weekend, packing as many as 10 friends in a hotel room to lessen costs.

"It gives us something to look forward to," he said. "No one honestly looks forward to going to class every day, but when we haven't seen each other for a week, tailgating is a great way to catch-up."

Bornholdt and his friends said they aren't always law-abiding citizens, and they've had their fair share of close calls with the law when it comes to alcohol, including one in Oklahoma.

After the University of Oklahoma narrowly defeated K-State last year, Bornholdt said the group was heading back to its hotel when he ran over a curb and noticed the police on his tail.

"It ended up being the funniest thing because we had nine or 10 guys crammed in the back of the van all trying to hide the beers and be cool," Bornholdt said.

"At a stoplight, the cop just pulled up and stopped beside us. I turned over to him and waved and he told me to roll the window down."

After a few questions, it became apparent the group wasn't in any trouble.

As far as the most interesting road trip, Bornholdt called it a tie between Toby Wallace, 2001 K-State graduate, tailgates and checks out the passing cars before the Eastern Illinois football game.

Oklahoma and the group's venture to Nebraska.

Bornholdt and his friends got so caught up in the table dancing, cheering, and drinking that attending the game was forgotten.

"We just stayed to drink and watch it on the TV there. And I ended up getting on the stairs and got the whole bar to quiet down and have a toast to the Wildcats. That was good," he said.

While alcohol is a staple in Bornholdt's tailgating expeditions, he has hit a road block concerning K-State regulations as of late.

"Normally, if you keep it in a cup and show a little respect, they don't mess with you," he said.

But that might not be the case this year, with tighter patrol of tailgaters and their beverage consumption.

When it comes to tailgating and alcohol regulations at various campuses, Bornholdt offered his explanation on where K-State ranks.

"Actually, K-State is the worst," Bornholdt said. "Nebraska is about the same as K-State while at Norman (Okla.) you can drink beers on the street. I don't particularly know if it is all of Norman or just game days. That makes it fun."

BOX OFFICE

'Barbershop' clips the competition to take top weekend box office spot

"Barbershop," the comedy starring Ice Cube as the reluctant owner of his late father's haircutting business, buzzed its way to the top of the weekend box office with its $20.6 million debut.

The film's success surprised some Hollywood observers because box office receipts had been in a recent lull following a summer full of blockbusters.

"Finally we had an up weekend," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of box-office tracker Exhibitor Relations. "It's due in large part because the film was well received by critics and Ice Cube has a following and he has crossover appeal."

The film, distributed by MGM, is a warmhearted comedy that filled a void among moviegoers, Dergarabedian said.

The top 20 movies at North American theaters Friday through Sunday, followed by distribution studio and gross, as compiled Monday by Exhibitor Relations Co. Inc. and Nielsen EDI Inc. are:

1. "Barbershop," MGM, $20.6 million
2. "My Big Fat Greek Wedding," IFC Films, $10.8 million
3. "One Hour Photo," Fox Searchlight, $8 million
4. "Swimfan," Fox, $6.05 million

Officials say Manhattan water safe; students, residents still concerned

Health educators say city's supply is free of toxins

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every time Alicia Koster takes a drink of water, she wonders what else is floating around in her glass besides hydrogen and oxygen.

Koster, junior in park management and conservation, said she is concerned about Manhattan's water supply.

"I really don't like it when I can taste a hard chlorine in the water," she said. "Sometimes it seems like I am drinking water from a swimming pool."

However, Pedro Armesto, assistant director of utilities and water, said there is really nothing to be concerned about.

"Every year, we come out with the Consumer Confidence Report in the spring," Armesto said.

"If there is a violation then we have to alert the public immediately."

Armesto said a cause for concern would be any chemical found in the water supply in amounts higher than the legal level allowed.

"We have never had a violation here in Manhattan," he said.

"This past spring, everything was detected way below the levels allowed."

The chemicals found in the water supply were everything one would expect to find in our area.

"We found nitrate, which is of course from fertilization by the farmers," Armesto said. "We also found fluoride, but that is something we add to the water at the plant."

Fluoride is added to the water to help prevent tooth decay, Armesto said.

Although people might think that bottled water is better for them, Armesto said that in some cases that is just not true.

"The water we process is just as safe or safer than bottled water," he said.

"The bottled water industry is not regulated as closely as our plant is."

Even though the plant has strict guidelines that surpass industry standards, Koster still has concerns.

"I'm not the only one who is worried about their water," she said.

"Sometimes the chlorine taste makes me feel sick. I think the chemicals used to get the water clean are worse for us than what is in the water to begin with."

Dianna Schalles, nutritionist and health educator at Lafene Health Center, said no matter what kind of water they drink, it is important for students to get eight cups of water a day.

"Normally our water is so well regulated by our government that it is really the safest water supply in the world," Schalles said.

"A lot of people perceive bottled water as safer, but either is really acceptable."

The only time to be concerned about the quality of water is in special cases, Schalles said.

"For pregnant women and very small children, it may be a good idea to use bottled water just to be safe," she said.

"But in the United States, infectious disease caused by a contaminated water supply is almost nonexistent."

Koster said that although she is not that worried about disease, she does not like the taste of Manhattan's water.

Lyman Schurle, owner of Schurle's water conditioning, said students have many options to filter their water.

"Most of the filters on the market today are charcoal filters," he said.

The charcoal filters work by absorbing chemicals that are in the water, but if the water passes too quickly through the filter it does not help, Schurle said.

Schurle said he and his wife drink only the best water on the market.

"The purest water you can get is steamed-distilled water. It is passed through charcoal filters and UV light."

Schurle said people should be aware that water is an important part of their physical well-being.

"In my opinion, a big percentage of people's health risks comes from the water they drink," Schurle said.

Koster said she's not sure if bad water has ever actually made her sick.

"I don't think I have gotten sick from the water," she said. "But the more I drink the water the more I think I should probably get a filter - just to be safe."

OPEC rejects West's call to boost oil output

By Dirk Beveridge
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

OSAKA, Japan - OPEC ministers decided Thursday to keep oil production levels unchanged through year's end, despite calls from the West for more output and fears a war on Iraq could disrupt supplies.

Consuming nations had lobbied for an increase in output to cut fuel bills, but OPEC figured the market is adequately supplied and any increase in price has been based on a "war premium" whipped up by Washington's saber-rattling about toppling Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

"I think they are political prices, not market prices," said Qatari oil minister Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, who was named Thursday as the new president of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

OPEC's most important player, Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi, said oil is now at a good level for buyers and sellers alike, adding he would like to see its price average $25 per barrel, slightly below the current level, but more expensive than oil has been for most of this year.

OPEC maintained its official supply ceiling of 21.7 million barrels per day, which is being boosted by up to 2 million barrels daily as most members cheat on their individual output quotas.

In an acknowledgment of concerns that high prices could prove economically damaging to oil-importing nations, the ministers said they would gather again on Dec. 12 at OPEC headquarters in Vienna to take another look.

OPEC pledged more oil would be pumped if the price moves too high, with some saying they would watch closely for any action against Iraq that might lead to supply shortages, or hoarding by consumers that could nudge prices upward.

Nigeria's presidential oil adviser, Rilwanu Lukman said OPEC would raise production if the price breaks out of its target range of $22 to $28 per barrel. Premium grades of crude traded on the New York and London futures markets have been higher than that lately, but OPEC said its benchmark price was just $26.92 on Wednesday.

On the New York Mercantile Exchange, nearby October crude futures rose 2 cents to $29.50 a barrel. On London's International Petroleum Exchange, nearby November Brent futures gained 6 cents to $28.38 per barrel.

Consuming nations, including the United States, are worried that supplies heading into the peak demand season could make oil cost even more, but many in OPEC think prices have been pushed higher by fears President Bush will decide to attack Iraq to oust Saddam - not by any imbalance in the market.

GOLF | Cats travel to Michigan

Karen Quintelier, junior transfer from the University of Minnesota, has also played the Mary Fossum course twice and said she hopes to continue playing a consistent game.

Quintelier played three consistent rounds in Nebraska to earn her a 12th-place individual finish — her best overall finish.

"I was really happy with my game. I had three really good, consistent rounds and I hope to improve on that," she said.

"Living and playing with Christine has really helped me. It's just good to be playing with a great team and a great coach."

Knight said she hopes players will continue to improve their play. The team's 3rd-place finish of 14 teams at the first tournament of the season in Nebraska was a good starting point.

The first round hurt, but things started working, she said. That trend will hopefully continue as the team looks to build on the successful 2001-02 campaign.

Golfstat, source for college golf scores and statistics, ranked K-State No. 53 to begin the season. Knight said that is a good ranking, but she said she expects it will be higher when the new rankings come out in October.

Knight said this team has experience and she knows the Wildcats will be strong once all cylinders are firing.

"This team has a lot of potential," she said. "I expect them to do great things."

Bush endorses Homeland Security alternative

After 3 weeks, Senate still unable to reach agreement on worker rights in department

By Curt Anderson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Senate Democrats and Republicans remained at an impasse Thursday over worker rights in the proposed Homeland Security Department as President Bush endorsed a new alternative.

In a 50-49 test vote along party lines, the Senate fell short of the 60 votes needed to prevent major GOP changes to a Democratic version of the bill. Bush has threatened to veto that version because it does not give him broad authority he seeks to rapidly hire, fire and deploy the agency's 170,000 workers to respond to terrorist threats.

A few hours after the vote, Bush endorsed an alternative being circulated by Sens. Phil Gramm, R-Texas, and Zell Miller, D-Ga., that makes some modest concessions to Democrats on the crucial issues of civil service and union protections.

Bush said the Gramm-Miller version is a "comprehensive substitute for a piece of legislation which we believe is flawed."

After touring a White House homeland security facility, Bush said the Senate must act in time for Congress to pass an acceptable bill before adjourning for the year.

"We're at a time of war and the Senate shouldn't be making it harder for an administration, whether this one or future administrations, to do their job," Bush told reporters. "America is still threatened. There are enemies out there which still hate us."

After quick House action in July, the Senate is in its third week of sluggish debate on Bush's plan to combine 22 agencies into a single department focused on protecting Americans from terrorism at home. The Coast Guard, Border Patrol, Customs Service, Transportation Security Administration and Secret Service are among those that would be transferred.

Although far from conclusive, the Senate vote Thursday ensured that Republicans will be able to offer amendments giving Bush the personnel powers he seeks. Democrats adamantly oppose those powers as attacks on the civil service system and union bargaining rights.

"I will fight that with every bone in my body," Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif. said.

Yet Miller, a conservative who frequently breaks with Democratic leaders, said there are others in his party willing to back the alternative.

He predicted many Democrats, facing a November election with control of Congress at stake, eventually would vote for a Homeland Security Department similar to that sought by Bush despite the influence wielded by labor unions within the party.

Senate committee passes additional aviation security steps to screen luggage for explosives

By Leslie Miller
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Senate committee on Thursday passed additional measures to tighten aviation security while also extending the year-end deadline for some airports to screen all passenger bags for explosives.

But the security steps might not become law because Congress could run out of time to act this year.

Legislation passed by the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee includes requirements for air cargo inspections, background checks on foreign flight school students and a six-month ban on small planes flying over stadiums.

The measure would extend, for as many as 40 airports, their Dec. 31 deadline to install the bomb-screening equipment.

The head of the agency overseeing aviation security told the committee that as many as 35 of the nation's 429 commercial airports would miss the deadline.

The House voted 217-211 last month to move the deadline back by a year.

Missing the deadline carries no legal penalty.

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas, wanted a year's extension, citing problems at airports in California, Florida and Georgia in meeting the current deadline.

But Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said the government should hold firm on six months.

"The terrorists are not sitting around and saying we'll just wait to attack until they get it fixed," she said.

The bill requires James Loy, head of the Transportation Security Administration, to report on how the airports that miss the deadline will comply and to ensure that other methods are used to screen baggage.

A separate proposal before the full Senate would relax the requirement imposed last year that all passenger screeners be U.S. citizens. Loy's agency, which is responsible for hiring a federal work force to screen airport passengers by Nov. 19, said Wednesday that it had hired the 31,693 screeners it needs.

The committee approved an inspection program for freight shipped on passenger and cargo planes.

The proposal would establish a database of trusted shippers so security could be focused on shippers that have not passed background checks and it would require security clearances for people who handle cargo.

CREDIT | Study finds credit-card usage increasing

"I just pay what I can that month," she said. "I have had some expensive things on it — one thing was $1,300."

Another way students get in over their heads with creditors are high interest rates and annual fees, Rebel said.

"Know what they are charging you," Rebel said. "Watch for sky-high interest rates and monthly fees. You can be losing money just to have a piece of plastic."

Rebel said some of the main advantages of credit cards include using them in emergencies, cutting back on the need to carry cash, and most importantly, building up good credit. She said many students who apply for credit cards do so because they want to establish good credit, but there are other ways to do it.

"It can be a good step to building good credit, but you can also do so by paying rent and bills on time, keeping a bank account and keeping steady employment," Rebel said.

Nellie Mae also found that credit card availability has been on the rise recently.

The percent of students with credit cards went up from 67 percent in 1998 to 83 percent in 2001, but the amount of credit cards per student has also been on the rise.

Fishel has gained a credit card each year for the past three years.

He said only uses one or two at a time though. "I am working on paying one of them off," he said.

Waller said she has two credit cards and has had them both for two years.

"I got them because I don't like to carry cash," she said.

According to Nellie Mae, 54 percent of freshman students, and 92 percent of sophomores have at least one card.

Rebel said she advises people not to apply for too much credit at once in order to keep them from being surprised with high interest rates and annual fees.

Fishel said he has been happy with his credit decisions and will continue to use them in the future, but wishes he would have done a few things differently.

"I wish I would have taken things a little slower," he said. "At one point, I was enough in debt that I had to take out a loan to pay it off. I am still paying off the loan."

THE LEARNING CURVE

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN
Devin Hoem, 2 years old, practices riding his tricycle in City Park while waiting for his older brother to finish soccer practice. Travis Hoem, who followed along in support, said that his son was "getting better every day."

DRINKING | Police to limit alcohol use at tailgate

According to state law and K-State policy, drinking at KSU Stadium is only allowed in specified areas set forth by administration. These areas do not include paved parking lots adjacent to the stadium or Lot 9, the grassy area between the stadium and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex or the agricultural lot north of the stadium.

Capt. Robert Mellgren, of the K-State Police, said officers are patrolling all lots, not just student lots. However, the larger groups usually include students, he said.

"We've got to get this under control before someone gets seriously injured," he said. "Plus, once we get it under control, it will stay that way."

He also said the open consumption of alcohol also has been a problem.

"We aren't going around smelling cups or glasses, but when you pop a top or flash a can in front of our face," he said, "then we have to take some sort of effort to curtail that."

Mellgren said partying responsibly does not create a problem and neither does just the group size. Problems arise when they occur together.

"If they are just being responsible drinkers, I don't have a problem with it," he said. "The size just became a factor. People were becoming intimidated by the size and drinking of the groups. They were causing problems with the average football fan."

Will Burton, president of Kappa Sigma Fraternity, said fans number between 100 to 200 around his fraternity's tailgates. However, he said members might change their tailgates depending on what happens at Saturday's game.

The heightened enforcement is unfortunate, Burton said, but understandable.

"It's unfortunate because tailgating is a great environment to get pumped up for the game," Burton said, "but I also understand that there is a need for a level of safety."

Muller said officials will continue to monitor lots throughout the season. Any one openly drinking can be asked to dispose of the beverage or leave, he said.

"Party responsibly," Muller said. "Don't abuse the privileges of others, and you will have no problem in the parking operation of the tailgates. But parties that bother other people and get out of hand will have cause for concern and action."

SENATE | Names on ballots to be randomized

Senate Vice Chair Vicki Conner said the drawing of lots for a ballot position isn't fair to all candidates.

"I do believe students vote on one category and are indifferent to the other categories, and vote for the first name that appears," Conner said.

Arts and Sciences Senator Seth Bridge called for more research to find a way to randomize the names through technological means.

"It created a fiasco last year," Bridge said. "I don't believe all the options have been exhausted. I really believe in random balloting. Why would you want to put anyone at a disadvantage?"

If there are technological means to randomize the ballots, the Student Governing Association does not have the funds to explore them, Harlan said. SGA is paying $17,000 for an in-house online election paid over three years.

"We are maxed out," Harlan said. "We are done. We can't afford it. This is what we had to do, and this is what we should do."

The third elections regulation revision, passed unanimously, requires a sample copy of the ballot to be available for review by the public and candidates the Friday before voting begins.

The previous regulation called for a copy of the ballot to be provided for review. However, with online voting, this is not a possibility.

Harlan said other changes will be addressed in the next few months and senators were encouraged to brainstorm ideas to create a smooth election process. The Senate Operations Committee will discuss further revisions at its meeting Tuesday, Sept. 24 in the Office of Student Activities and Services conference room. The meeting is open to the public.

IRAQ | Bush's resolution would authorize solo actions

Bush's proposed resolution says Iraq has repeatedly violated U.N. resolutions and international law by possessing chemical and biological weapons, seeking nuclear weapons, repressing the Iraqi people and consorting with terrorists.

Although Democratic leaders predicted quick approval of the resolution, they said they might want to make changes.

"We don't want to be a rubber stamp, but we do want to be helpful and supportive," said Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D.

"Congress has a role here, and we'll assert that role whenever it is necessary or appropriate."

Some Senate Democrats, who met behind closed doors Thursday evening to discuss Iraq, assailed Bush's proposal. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., said the measure was "incredibly broad" and unacceptable.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., said he would like the resolution to specify that Bush needs a U.N. resolution backing the use of force. "Going alone has some very significant risks," Levin said. Republicans disagreed.

"One veto in the U.N. Security Council shouldn't obstruct us doing what we have to do," said Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala. GOP leaders praised Bush's proposal. "I'm perfectly happy with the language," said Senate Minority Leader Trent Lott, R-Miss. He said he expected a Senate vote the first week in October.

As drafted, Bush's resolution would authorize him to use force — unilaterally if he deemed necessary — without waiting for the U.N. to act.

It reads: "The president is authorized to use all means that he determines to be appropriate, including force, in order to enforce the United Nations Security Council resolutions, defend the national security interests of the United States against the threat posed by Iraq, and restore international peace and security in the region."

Bush spoke to reporters after meeting with Powell on his difficult diplomatic effort to draft a U.N. resolution against Iraq. The administration has to overcome strong reservations by Russia and France, which have veto power as permanent council members.

Britain is expected to side with the United States. The fifth permanent member, China, has voiced opposition to unilateral U.S. military action but has not threatened to veto measures calling for collective action.

"The United Nations Security Council must work with the United States and other concerned parties to send a clear message that we expect Saddam to disarm," Bush said.

"And if the United Nations Security Council won't deal with the problem, the United States and some of our friends will," he declared.

The gap between Russian and American viewpoints was underlined in comments by Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov at the Pentagon, where he met with Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Ivanov said he believed U.N. weapons inspectors will settle the question of whether Iraq has weapons of mass destruction.

Rumsfeld has said repeatedly that inspections are not reliable because Iraq has a long history of deceiving inspectors — and because it has had nearly four years to figure out how to hide its weapons.

Bush was to meet at the White House on Friday with both the Russian defense minister and its foreign minister, Igor Ivanov.

Football tickets — Tickets are available for Saturday's home game against the Trojans. Fans can call the K-State ticket office toll free at (800) 221-CATS.

Radio — Fans can tune in to KMKF-FM 101.5 or KMAN-AM 1350 for pre-game, game and post-game coverage of the Cats' game against Southern California. Mid America Sports Network will be the official network carrier for K-State Athletics. The network covers 25 affiliates throughout the state of Kansas. Wyatt Thompson will be the 'Voice of the Wildcats' for 2002, with former Wildcat quarterback Stan Weber on color and Chris Allison on the sideline. Steven Weber is the producer of the Mid America Sports Network.

Television — The game will be the Big 12 Conference debut of the TBS/Superstation package. Ron Thulin has play-by-play with analyst Charles Davis. Craig Sager will be on the sideline with Erin Andrews doing atmosphere features.

Series — K-State opened its 2001 season in the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum with a 10-6 victory over the Trojans on Sept. 8. That was Coach Bill Snyder's 100th career victory and was the first meeting ever between the teams.

The Wildcats scored all their points in the first half a year ago, getting a 41-yard field goal from Jared Brite and a second-quarter touchdown when Nick Leckey covered a fumble in the end zone for a score.

Sultan McCullough scored on a 7-yard run in the third quarter for USC, but the extra-point kick was blocked.

USC threatened in the final minutes of the game, but K-State's Henry Bryant recovered a fumble at the Wildcats' 24-yard line with 2:33 left to thwart the rally.

K-State had a pair of 100-yard rushers in the game, as Josh Scobey carried 27 times for 165 yards and quarterback Eli Roberson gained 119 yards on 21 carries.

USC quarterback Carson Palmer had 197 yards passing and a team-high 60 yards rushing, while Kareem Kelly had seven catches for 75 yards for the Trojans.

Storyline — K-State faces 11th-ranked Southern California in the final game of a four-game homestand against non-conference competition that begins the year.

The game is the first time the Wildcats have faced a ranked non-conference opponent since losing 56-3 at Washington on Sept. 28, 1991. The Huskies were ranked eighth in the nation at that time.

This week, the Wildcats moved back into the college football national rankings for the first time since Oct. 13, 2001 when they dropped out following a loss at Texas Tech.

The Wildcats were 25 in the Associated Press poll and 23 in the ESPN/USA Today rankings.

K-State is looking to go 4-0 for the eighth time in Bill Snyder's 14 seasons in Manhattan. The game against USC is the first non-league home matchup against a ranked team since the Cats lost 45-10 to then 17th-ranked Iowa on Sept. 10, 1988.

USC is making its second trip to a Big 12 conference school in as many weeks. The Trojans won 40-3 at Colorado Sept. 14 to improve to 2-0.

The last time — The Cats last had a player rush for three touchdowns in a game last season when quarterback Eli Roberson rushed for three scores against Oklahoma on Sept. 29, a game K-State lost 38-37 in Norman.

Troy Polamalu

USC SAFETY

The incident:

Dangerous hit on former Cat Aaron Lockett

Polamalu's defense:

"That's just the way the game is played. I think we smelled the blood after that. And like a bunch of sharks, we were all over it."

Local sheriff's take:

"We don't like him. What he did to Aaron last year was totally uncalled for. For that reason, I think a lot of players on the team don't like him, and he's probably going to get some shots taken at him because of it. That's football."

Malicious hit on Lockett still burns K-State players

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State players have thought about The Hit for an entire year now.

In their eyes, it wasn't aggressive playing that Southern California safety Troy Polamalu did against Aaron Lockett last year, it was dirty.

Polamalu nearly took Lockett out of the Cats' season opener at USC, leading with his helmet to take tackle the then-senior, who was attempting to return a punt.

USC's star defensive player was penalized the minimum five yards for violating the halo penalty, but wasn't ejected, like Coach Bill Snyder thought he should have been.

But, Snyder said, all of that is water under the bridge as far as he is concerned.

His players, though, still remember what happened to their teammate.

"It was obvious that it was a malicious hit," linebacker Terry Pierce said. "Everything about it was wrong. We went back and looked at that hit several times, and everything about it was wrong. They may say one thing, but we definitely saw what we saw.

"It was a cheap way to try and take somebody good out of a game."

But it didn't. It may have rattled the Cats and pumped up the Trojans, but K-State still won last year's contest 10-6.

This year, players are determined to have the same result. A Wildcat victory would be more of a state-

KSU, Southern California meet for round 2; Saturday's game earns top billing

Traveler, the band, O.J. — things that can't save the Trojans this week

Hello, Southern Cal, we've met before. Yes, I know you don't like to be called that. A former Collegian columnist pointed that out in last year's column.

Thousands of K-Staters made the trek out to Los Angeles in 2001. We got to see the Coliseum, your band play "Conquest" and your beloved horse named Traveler.

It was a neat atmosphere, but unfortunately for you Trojans, Traveler didn't register a tackle and your band couldn't stop us from for more than 300 yards. Even your crowd didn't help you tack on a PAT.

Last time, it was your turf. This time, you come to our house.

A non-conference team

hasn't come into Manhattan and left with a "W" since 1989.

Our stadium might hold only half as many as the Coliseum, but unlike your stadium, ours will be full.

And "Purple People," unlike your fans, will be loud, fired up and in the game.

In past weeks, I have given you five things to look forward to in the upcoming game.

This week, the gloves come off. For the rest of the season, I will give you three reasons why the Cats will win Saturday.

Hog heaven

Saturday is one of my favorite gameday traditions here at K-State.

Unlike USC traditions, which have been around since Achilles as Trojan fans like to point out, "Harley Day" is a fairly new tradition here in Manhattan. More than 50 "hogs" will circle Wagner Field like vultures waiting for some Trojan road kill.

And speaking of the Hogs, I think our offensive line will be able to move the So. California beach bums right out of the way for Darren Sproles and Daniel Davis, while also giving Marc Dunn time to burn Troy "Little O.J." Polamalu deep.

Special teams

This is the difference maker. Last week, the same Colorado team that managed only 60-some-odd yards of offense made the USC special teams seize up like a Buick. Colorado

See TALKING SMACK Page 6

Wildcats beware: USC prepared this year after seeing competitive teams

Don't count on a late fumble to save K-State again.

The Trojans come into Saturday's game a much-matured team since early last season when the Wildcats barely squeezed by them, 10-6. With the loss of 15 starters, the Wildcats are the gutted remains of a team that went 6-6 and was obliterated by Syracuse in the prestigious Insight.com Bowl last season.

More significantly, while USC has been fine-tuning against the likes of big programs such as Auburn and Colorado (ranked sixth in the preseason), the Wildcats have been toying around with Division I-AA teams. They are the nation's top offense because they've been host to grossly undermated programs. They average 60 points and close to 250 yards rushing a game because they've played Western Kentucky, Louisiana-Monroe and Eastern Illinois.

One would hope a serious team like K-State could outscore such competition 179-16.

Yet, all this time that the Wildcats have been rolling around in catnip instead of sharpening their nails, the Trojans were making real teams look like prep squads.

"We haven't played anyone who is in the same hemisphere as USC so it's a little difficult to determine exactly where we are at this particular time," Wildcat coach Bill Snyder said.

Last year, K-State finished with the third-best defense in the nation.

That was before they lost their leading tackler in first-team All-Big 12 linebacker Ben Leber and both starting safeties, including All-Big-12 third-teamer Jon McGraw. McGraw was second on the team in tackles and led the team in interceptions. While they do have a dangerous defensive back in Terence Newman, who already has two interceptions, and the Big 12's Defensive Newcomer of the Year in lineman Tank Reese, the defense is far from what it was last year.

The brains behind that stellar defense, coordinator Phil Bennett, hit the road and now

Cat passing attack finding success

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's offense didn't see the field until Sept. 14 2:13 was remaining in the first quarter.

When they finally did, quarterback Marc Dunn had the opportunity to throw just four passes in the game.

One fell incomplete.

The other was a completion to Darren Sproles, but he then fumbled it away.

And the rest were completed for touchdowns.

Three games into the season, it's apparent the K-State passing game has the ability to pose a deep threat.

In the last two games, K-State has scored on six touchdown passes, each over 15 yards, including three that went for more than 40 yards.

The Wildcats only seem to be continuing a long-running K-State tradition, though.

Going into Saturday's game, K-State has not thrown for a touchdown pass of less than 17 yards in 13 straight games.

Has K-State become accustomed to living or dying by the home-run ball? Not necessarily Coach Bill Snyder said.

"We have probably in the past have attempted to throw the ball deeper than what might be considered normal," Snyder said. "This year, I don't know if that's always been the case."

Rather, Snyder attributes the apparent deep ball obsession to the lack of sustained drives his offense has had the opportunity to run in games.

"Really, there's not much to draw from because we haven't thrown the ball that many times," Snyder said.

Kelly Glasscock | COLLEGIAN
Terence Newman catches a 51-yard pass from Marc Dunn for a touchdown in the first quarter of the game against Louisiana-Monroe. The Cats won the game 68-0.

But with the speed that the Wildcats find at wide receiver this season, they may have a hard time not converting a pass for a touchdown.

On loan from the defense, Wildcat cornerback Terence Newman has the highest yard-per-catch average.

The Cat specialist has one reception for 51 yards and a touchdown.

James Terry has three catches for 78 yards and two scores. Against Eastern Illinois, he broke away for a 41-yard touchdown reception from quarterback Jeff Schwinn.

Taco Wallace, though, has emerged as the leading receiver.

After three games, Wallace has accounted for 173 yards receiving with seven catches, two touchdowns and a 58 yard highlight reel bomb from Marc Dunn last Saturday.

While Wallace has already easily upstaged his performance from a year ago (two catches for 17 yards) has he shown fans everything he's got?

"No," he said. "I've got a little something stashed away."

Saturday the Wildcats will return to action, and will likely take a few shots down field. Regardless of their success, co-captain Nick Leckey said the large numbers that have been put up so far don't necessarily relegate K-State to only being able to throw deep.

"We've shown we have the quick strike ability," Leckey said. "It's not one of the goals, it's just something that happens with some of the plays we run."

Skilled players help Trojans balance offense

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three games into the 2002 schedule, K-State has won three easy decisions and dominated three lower-tiered teams.

En route to the fast start, though, the Wildcat defense has faced three completely different looks on offense.

Western Kentucky entered KSU Stadium opening day after averaging more than 300 rushing yards per game last season. As the game progressed, the Hilltoppers stayed true to their unbalanced offense, rushing nearly 80 percent of the time.

Eastern Illinois also presented K-State with an unbalanced attack. The Panthers threw the ball on 42 of 78 plays, which accounted for nearly 60 percent of their yards through the air.

On Saturday, though, the Wildcats will face a different story. For the first time this season, K-State will encounter a top-caliber offense dedicated to splitting time between the ground and air.

"I think they really want to be a balanced football team, they want to run the ball well, and they certainly did that against Colorado," Coach Bill Snyder said.

"They were a very balanced football team, and that makes them harder to defend against."

Against Colorado, a 40-3 thrashing the Trojans dished up Sept. 14, USC was able to find its desired balance. The team ran 31 pass plays and

Receivers

USC has a strong corps of receivers that could prove to be problematic for the Cat defense. Here is a rundown of the Trojans' top pass catchers.

	Yards	TD's
Mike Williams	146	0
Kareem Kelly	102	1
Malaefou MacKenzie	155	1
Keary Colbert	75	0
Gregg Guenther, Jr.	22	0

ran the ball 41 times. In the end, the Trojans gained only 60 more yards through the air than on the ground.

The key to the Trojan offense lies in the skill positions.

After only two games, USC has three different wide receivers with more than 100 yards. The talented bunch is led by senior Kareem Kelly.

Kelly, a four-year starter, has caught a pass in every game he has played. He relies on his speed to find a crease in the defense and actually splits his athletic talents between the USC football team and the track squad.

Helping to take the pressure off Kelly will be several underclassmen. True freshman Mike Williams leads the Trojans in receiving with 11 catches for 146 yards. Williams uses his 6-foot-5, 210-pound frame to gain an advantage.

Junior Keary Colbert is entering his second season as a starter, already contributing with six catches for 75 yards.

With Kelly and Colbert getting the attention and upstart Williams as the unknown factor, K-State defensive back Terence Newman said it will be a challenge.

"They're arguably one of the best receiving corps in the nation," Newman said. "They have a true freshman and then they have Kareem Kelly who has been productive since he was a freshman. So it's going to be tough for this weekend."

In the backfield, USC will rely on a two seniors to carry its running game.

Against Colorado, Sultan McCullough led the Trojans with 110 yards and a touchdown. He is joined at tailback by Malaefou MacKenzie.

MacKenzie presents not only a credibly running threat, but also pass-catching ability. He is third on the Trojans receiving list, highlighted by a six-catch effort for 117 yards against Auburn.

But the man behind the Trojan's potent offense is coordinator Norm Chow.

Chow spent 27 years running the BYU passing attack, and now is in his second year as offensive coordinator at USC. At BYU, Chow coached six of the top 12 pass efficiency leaders in NCAA history.

K-State defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said that it's Chow's game plan, combined with the talented athletes on the field, that makes USC's offense so dangerous.

"They're capable of moving it both ways, but our job is to make sure that they can't be multi-dimensional," he said. "If you take something away, then you have a chance."

IN THE SPOTLIGHT

Quarterback to face 1st true test against tough Trojan defense

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Five career starts aren't much to speak of.

That's how many quarterback Marc Dunn has under his belt as a Wildcat.

The first was against Texas Tech last season, where Dunn was picked off twice and completed just 40 percent of his passes en route to a 38-19 loss to the Red Raiders.

The second start of 2001 was a little more positive for the senior. Dunn ran for a score and threw for another against Kansas, but was intercepted twice in K-State's 40-6 win over the Jayhawks.

This season Dunn has been the starter in all three Cat victories.

Granted, those wins have been against two I-AA teams and an even weaker Division-I squad, but Dunn said those starts have given him the confidence he needs to perform well against Southern California this weekend.

"The comfort level I have within our offense is good," Dunn said.

Dunn has made marked improvements from game one

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

USC signal-caller among nation's best talents

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

He needs 51 yards to become USC's all-time passing leader.

He needs 302 yards to become USC's all-time leader in total offense.

In his career, he has thrown for 8,422 yards and 41 touchdowns.

His name is Carson Palmer, and he's coming to Manhattan on Saturday.

USC coach Pete Carroll said Palmer is equipped to become one of the nation's standout quarterbacks.

"Carson is off to a fantastic start," Carroll said. "He's playing great football and he's put two games back-to-back that are almost carbon copies of each other. That shows that his consistency and command of what we're doing are both there."

"I think he's as good a football player as anybody is going to see this year and he's poised to have a great senior year."

Calling it a fantastic start may be an understatement. In topping Auburn in USC's opener, Palmer was 23 of 32 for 302 yards and a touchdown. That's a 71.9 percent completion rating.

Against Colorado last Saturday, Palmer completed 73.3 percent of his passes, going 22 of 30 for 244 yards with a touchdown. These numbers came by way of going six for his first six and completing all eight of his attempts in the second half.

Carson Palmer
USC QUARTERBACK

what makes him so good. He always looks for the open receiver and he always finds the open receiver.

What does Coach Bill Snyder know about Palmer?

"Good numbers," Snyder said. "I know that. To complete 72 percent of his passes against two really good football teams is quite a task."

"Throwing in excess of 8,000 yards in a career tells you a lot of things as well. That tells you he's very accurate, it tells you he's confident and efficient, and it tells you he's got an awful lot of experience."

Snyder said the Trojan quarterback's ability doesn't end with throwing the ball, an assessment reinforced by Palmer's two rushing scores this year.

"He's got some mobility about him as well," Snyder said. "Last year against us he brought the ball out on more than one occasion and made us miss him a little bit."

"He poses some threats if you don't stay in your rush lanes and do the things you're supposed to when you're trying to rush the passer."

Snyder said Palmer could very well be posing a problem to pass rushes some Sunday in the not-too-distant future.

"People would say 'the prototype NFL quarterback', and I wouldn't argue with that at all," he said.

A BETTER OPPONENT

Trojans prove worth, stinginess on defense

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Early on in USC's season opener against Auburn, it looked as though the Tigers, and tailback Carnell "Cadillac" Williams, had the Trojans right where they wanted them.

Williams rolled over the USC defense in the first half to the tune of 94 yards on 21 carries and a touchdown, and the Tigers got another score just before the half to make it 14-14.

It looked as though Auburn would be able to ride its "Cadillac" all the way to a win.

But USC's defense came out of the locker room changed. Instead of another 100 yard half, Williams was treated to a net total of minus two yards rushing on seven carries in the third and fourth quarters.

The Tigers would be able to get just a field goal after half-time, and when it was all over, USC stood triumphant, 24-17.

USC then took its one win to Boulder, Colo., last Saturday and promptly owned the defending Big 12 champs 40-3.

Facing a backup quarterback, USC shut down every facet of Colorado's offense. The highly touted Buffalo running attack was able to rush for just 37 yards against the Trojan defense, and Colorado totaled out at 61 yards on the day.

Trojan coach Pete Carroll said that while his defense was suspect at the beginning of the year, some questions have been answered.

"We've played pretty solid, though we were a little shaky coming out of the chute," Carroll said. "Against Auburn we had not had an opportunity to do all of our scrimmaging and camping as we were kind of nicked up."

"And it showed," he said. "We were sloppy tackling and technique wise. But once we got our feet on the ground, we got going, and we've played very solid for the last six quarters. I'm pleased we're going in the right direction."

Carroll said it wasn't any miracle that caused his players to make adjustments on the defensive side of the ball. It was just a decision his players made to step it up.

"We just played better," Carroll said. "Basically, it was just getting down to business and playing, running, hitting, and tackling well. We missed a bunch of tackles in the first half of the Auburn game, and we haven't missed very many since."

Carroll said two wins against quality teams means added confidence for his defense.

"We feel pretty good," he said. "We've beat good opponents. Auburn has come out smokin'. In their other two games they've scored a lot of points and run the football on everybody, and Colorado is the Big 12 champion."

Coach Bill Snyder said he realizes USC's defense is more than capable of giving most anybody problems.

"They play their schemes, and they play them very well," he said. "You go back and look at last year against us. It's a 10-6 game and yes, they gave up some yards, but they didn't necessarily let us run rampant on the endzone."

But Snyder said it's not a statistic from last year's USC defense that worries him.

"It's the number one defense in the nation according to statistics," he said. "And again, against two pretty good football teams."

Balanced USC offense presents new challenge for K-State

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

USC has played two games against quality opponents this year.

And USC has two wins over quality opponents this year.

The men of Troy passed for 302 yards and rushed for 84 more in topping Auburn 24-17 in their home opener.

In last Saturday's 40-3 manhandling of Colorado in Boulder, Colo., USC's rushing total ballooned to 181 yards while the passing total dropped just 54.

Based solely on stats, one reason USC is 2-0 likely has something to do with the balance its offense has been able to produce.

One way to disrupt a balanced attack is to frustrate its flow with good linebackers, an asset Coach Bill Snyder said the Wildcats have to prove they possess on Saturday.

"They will be extremely significant in this ballgame," Snyder said. "All three of them, or four or five for that matter, have played well. Terry and Josh and Bryan, as our starters, work well together and have played well together."

"The bottom line is that A: they're playing pretty well together and B: they will be tremendously instrumental in the outcome of how we defend, either well or not so well, against USC's run and pass."

Linebacker Josh Buhl said defending well against the Trojans' dual attack means countering with dual-responsibility linebackers.

"Any time you have a team that balances the pass and the run, as USC does, linebackers are going to be a factor," Buhl said. "We have to get back to the secondary and help them out, and we also have to help out the front."

Linebackers, no matter how involved in the passing game, are still used in stopping the ground attack. Against USC, the Wildcats' linebackers could very well have their hands full.

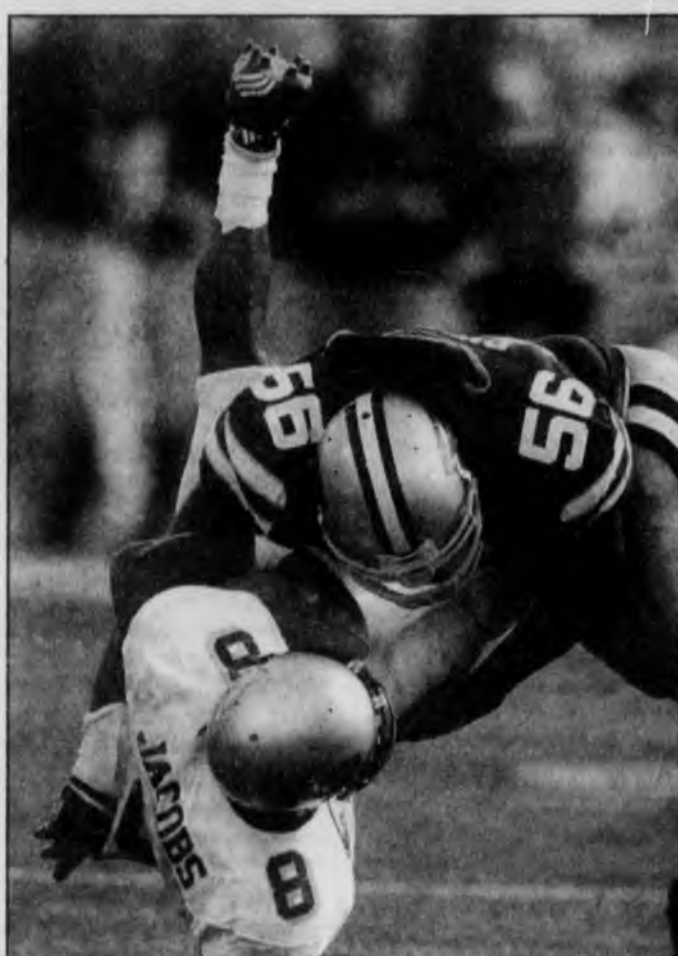

So far this year, the Trojans have handed the ball off to five different running backs. The combined efforts of this group, anchored by Sultan McCullough's 180 yards on the season, translate into 132.5 yards per contest.

Wildcat linebacker and team captain Terry Pierce said slowing the production of Troy's running backs early will be essential in setting the tone for the rest of the game.

"In any given game, linebackers are going to be important," Pierce said. "Especially with a team like USC that likes to start the offense with a good running game."

"A lot of that is going to depend on how good the linebackers play. If we play well and fit into our gaps the way we're supposed to, then they won't be able to run the ball and get into a groove with their offense."

Pierce said stopping the running game is the key to stopping the balance of USC and that K-State holds this key.

"I think any running back has a certain amount of power to him," Pierce said. "If you let him have it. They continually ran the ball downhill on Colorado."

"We will not let the ball be run downhill on us."

TALKING SMACK | K-State's 2001 win not a fluke, look for repeat

blocked a field goal and a punt.

Hmmm, the Trojans tend to take a play off on special teams.

K-State's special teams are usually more opportunistic than that.

Again, the Cats are one of the top units in the country, leading the nation with touchdowns off punt blocks and punt returns.

Not to mention every player donning the purple on Saturday remembers what sort of O.J.-like tactics USC resorted to last year to try to stop K-State's explosiveness.

The Cats will exploit this on Saturday.

The "Lynch Mob"

Get the nooses ready for Saturday, because USC Coach Pete Carroll threw down the gauntlet last week after the Colorado game when he said, "We can throw, and the quarterback doesn't get knocked down."

This week the defensive line will look to change Pete's tune. Carson Palmer provides the ultimate target for the front seven at 6 feet 6 inches and 230 pounds. Not only is Palmer lanky, he is incredibly slow rolling out of the pocket.

Don't be surprised if Palmer has a Trent Green-like day getting sacked regularly while tossing interceptions.

Unlike a west-coast crowd that yawns at defensive dominance, we love it. The Coliseum, for the most part last year, was about as rocking as a Cessna Stadium crowd at a Wichita State football game in the mid '80s.

The only time the Coliseum crowd got fired up was after the cheap shot on Aaron Lockett. The most disturbing part of the whole experience was the response of USC fans.

As Lockett lay motionless on the field, the Trojan crowd went nuts. And I don't mean just a little "ooo" or "awe." It rose to its feet and got fired up.

The lack of sportsmanship, not only from USC players, but also from the fans, troubles me to this day.

I guess you can't expect much from a school that produces quality citizens like O.J. Simpson.

Chris is a senior in secondary education. You can e-mail him at chrishank@yahoo.com.

USC | Players focus on earning win, not taking retaliatory shot

ment than any retaliation on Polamalu.

"We think about that all the time," cornerback Terence Newman said.

"We're trying to keep things clean. We don't have any reason to take any dirty shots like that. Our focus is to play a good game in between the lines. If we do that, we'll win the game."

And K-State is focused on doing things legally.

Scoring touchdowns goes further than late hits or cheap shots, receiver Taco Wallace said.

"It would be the best thing in the world," Wallace said. "Getting back, I can't really do anything about what he did last year, but if I burn him for a touchdown or two, that would be the best thing."

But Polamalu's hit has provided the intensity factor for this game, Snyder said.

As if K-State needed any added motivation, Southern California will be the first ranked opponent the Wildcats will face this season, let alone their first real test of the year.

"This is a game that is extremely important," Snyder said.

"All the rest of them are, but this one has a little different connotation than the others, they understand that."

The offense might understand that more than any other K-State unit.

Offensive Coordinator Ron Hudson said their job is to score points, not set up plays that look to put a hit on Polamalu.

"It's not the character of this team to pull any kind of cheap shot," Hudson said. "But it presents the intensity factor and hopefully our players can reflect on what happened and use it for this game."

But could the Cats get too amped and then come out flat?

Snyder said that's a possibility given the magnitude of the game, as well as the fact the Cats have walloped three straight opponents.

But in all likelihood, overconfidence will not be an issue for his team.

"I think our players have a good mind-set about who they are and where they are," Snyder said.

"I don't think there's an air of overconfidence that lingers, now I could be proven wrong, but I don't think that's the case."

DUNN | Senior quarterback realizes magnitude of USC game

to now, Coach Bill Snyder said.

In K-State's game with Western Kentucky, Dunn threw just six passes, but completed five of them. He was sacked twice in the game, but hasn't been dropped for a loss since then.

"The good thing for Marc is, when he makes a mistake he learns from it," Snyder said. "Some mistakes are mental, some are physical, but it's the mental ones that need to be corrected. He's not going to make the same mistake too many times."

Facing his first Division-I opponent of the season, Dunn completed seven of 10 passes for 147 yards in K-State's 68-0 win over Louisiana-Monroe.

The senior also threw for three touchdowns, and he ran for another.

But after the game, Offensive Coordinator Ron Hudson said his quarterback can't be too confident because he hasn't done that against a tough opponent yet.

"That confidence he gained, you have to take it with a grain of salt because of who we played tonight," he said.

"We aren't playing the USC's or people like that."

Dunn now has a chance to prove his worth. He will start against USC, arguably the biggest game in his short career at K-State.

"It's really kind of a humbling experience to say you're going to play against USC," Dunn said. "They're one of the great traditional powerhouse teams in the country, so this is an exciting time."

Snyder said he is confident in what Dunn brings to the table because of the way he prepares.

Whether it's Western Kentucky or USC, he said his quarterback's mentality is the same.

"Marc is one of those guys that works very hard on his preparation and stays focused throughout the course of the week," Snyder said.

"He's done well at this point in the season in terms of his preparation. That doesn't mean he doesn't make mistakes. We all do."

But the mistakes Dunn has been able to get away with against the Cats' first three opponents, he won't be able to against the Trojans.

The QB knows this. "I feel ready," Dunn said. "I'm ready."

WILDCATS | Trojans' early-season success prepares USC for Saturday's contest; Cats won't be so lucky this time

runs the show for Southern Methodist.

His replacement, Bobby Eliott, faces a team that averages 270 passing yards and 450 total yards a game. A team that seems to have established a successful running game after racking up 181 rushing yards against Colorado.

On the other end of the ball, K-State lost its star running back, Josh Scobey, to graduation. Scobey set a single-season school record last season with 1,263 rushing yards. Fullback Rock Cartwright, the team's third-leading rusher, is also gone and so is his excellent blocking. These are critical losses for a team that relies so heavily on its running game.

The Wildcats do return the nucleus of a talented and experienced offensive line and run a dangerous option, but the Trojans and their top-rated defense aren't allowing much on the ground so far this season.

The Trojans allowed only 61 total yards against the Buffaloes and despite allowing 143 rushing yards to Auburn in the first half of the season opener, they didn't allow anything in the second half. In fact, Auburn backtracked three yards.

If K-State can't get things going on the ground, the game is in USC's hands. Although Marc Dunn is a more accurate passer than Eli Roberson, and wide receiver Taco Wallace averages over 20 yards per reception, this is still a team that ranked last in the Big 12 and 113th nationally in passing offense last season.

The only area where K-State has an advantage, and it is clear as day, is special teams play. Last week the Trojans had a punt and field goal blocked, missed two extra points, botched a punt return and were flagged on what became a 59-yard kick return.

The Wildcats are noted for their special teams.

"It's been a real strong aspect of their team for years, we're very wary of what they can do," Carroll said.

The bottom line is that K-State is not ready for the Trojans. Last season they played a schedule that was rated as the fourth toughest among I-A schools and at this point of their 2002 campaign, this might as well be the season-opener.

"We were shabby," Carroll said of his team when it faced the Wildcats last year. "They were too far ahead of us in too many schemes with too many plays. We couldn't hang with them last year."

K-State will learn what that feels like.

No-call deadline nears

Public has until midnight tonight to register on list

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

People wanting to be on the first round of "off-limits" numbers to telemarketers have until midnight today to register.

The Kansas No-Call Act allows Kansas residents to register their residential telephone numbers on a list that will restrict sales calls to their homes.

All persons registered by today will be published in the first No-Call list, which will be released Oct. 1. Residents can register by calling (866) 362-4160 or visiting www.ink.org/public/ksag.

Registration has been available since August. Mary Tritsch, spokeswoman for Attorney General Carla Stovall, said more than 180,000 people registered in the first week alone. The response was overwhelming, she said.

"We knew people would be very interested in getting on, but they really jumped on the bandwagon right away," she said.

So far, more than 307,000 people are registered for the first No-Call list. Tritsch said registration is valid for five years.

Telemarketers have up to 130 days to call consumers after they register. And, once a name appears on the list, companies have 30 days to remove it from their internal call lists.

However, some calls will still be permitted. Tritsch said organizations soliciting charitable donations or calls regarding political candidates or issues are exempt. All calls that do

Harmony celebration starts today

Week of activities designed to promote diversity, fight hate

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Community Cultural Harmony Week will kick off its 15th year of activities Monday and will run through Saturday. The event is sponsored by K-State, the city of Manhattan and USD 383.

Douglas Benson, co-chair of Community Cultural Harmony Week, said the event formally known as Racial Ethnic Harmony Week has changed its name in order to be more inclusive.

"We want to draw more people in," Benson said.

Benson said despite the name change the goal will be the same.

"Our goal is to get people thinking about, participating in and learning about all of the cultures that make up the United States," Benson said.

Cathy Harnes, director of human resources for the city of Manhattan, said she would recommend students listen to the keynote speakers. Harnes said these events offer people a chance to celebrate the rich

Students balk over hours

iTAC data influences library policy

By Edie Hall
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

State budget cuts forced Hale Library to decrease its hours by 20 percent earlier this semester — a move that has left some students who use the library for late-night studying upset.

Brice Hobrock, dean of K-State libraries, said library officials looked at data from service points in Hale such as the Information Technology Assistance Center, to see when the least amount of questions were asked. They used this data to determine which hours should be cut.

Hobrock said prior to 8 a.m. and after midnight there were sometimes no students, and there were also few questions asked on Saturday mornings.

"The counter argument is that students may just need these times to study — not to ask questions," Hobrock said.

Hobrock said while the management committee that made the decision to cut hours discussed the decision with the entire library staff and Provost James Coffman, it didn't consult students, and he doesn't believe it should have.

"It wouldn't have changed the situation," Hobrock said. "Students would've had the point of view that the library should be open until 2 a.m. or all night, for that matter. Some faculty members wanted to close it at 10. Midnight is a compromise."

However, some student leaders feel differently.

Seth Bridge, chairman of academic affairs and the university relations committee, said Student Senate has started a petition to get library hours extended. The group will present the petition to President Jon Wefald around early November.

"It's our estimation that this is a serious problem," Bridge said. "Students aren't having study time available to

Festival offers variety of activities, demonstrations

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The food was good, the cars were cool, and the tepees were neat.

But Taylor Lake, 7, was sure of his favorite part of the Little Apple Festival on Saturday.

"The fighting," Lake, Wamego resident, said as he waved his fake sword in unison with the medieval demonstrators.

The medieval fighting, one of many folk-life demonstrations featured at the free weekend festival in City Park, was educational as much as it was fun, Michael Bethea, sophomore in education, said.

"We try and recreate the better part of the Middle Ages with fighting, archery, equestrian and the arts," said Bethea, president of K-State's Society for Creative Anachronism. "It is really entertaining and is fun to participate in."

To prepare for the fighting, the demonstrators practice twice a week and have events almost every weekend with others in their "kingdom" — Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri.

But the Little Apple Festival always draws a big crowd, Kris Bethea said.

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Harry Potter's vibrating broomstick garnering much national attention

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

September reports in the New York Post and the Toronto Star, quoting parents' Web site "reviews" of the Mattel $19.99 Nimbus 2000 plastic-replica broomstick from the latest Harry Potter movie, highlighted its battery-powered special effect: vibration. Wrote a Texas mother: "I was surprised at how long (my daughter and her friends) can just sit in her room and play with this magic broomstick." Another said her daughter fights her son for it but complains that "the batteries drain too fast." A New Jersey mother, sensing a problem, said her daughter could keep playing with it, "but with the batteries removed." Still another mother, age 32, said she enjoyed it as much as her daughter.

In Perth, Scotland, in September, Edwin Young was ordered to pay Yvonne Rennie the equivalent of $10,000 for a 1998 accident that was caused when Young had an epileptic seizure while driving and lost control of his car. In an unpolitically correct twist, almost $6,000 worth of the compensation was to pay Rennie for the post-trauma stress, including having to endure watching Young while the seizure continued.

The F state (Florida)

Among the 11 proposed constitutional amendments on the November ballot in Florida is one to make pregnant pigs more comfortable by forbidding farmers to house them in "inhumane" 2-foot-by-7-foot cages, even though, reportedly, only two farmers in the state still use the cages, and they say the cages prevent injury to the pigs. If it passes, it will likely be the only animal right enshrined in a U.S. constitution.

In August, the state attorney in Palm Beach, Fla., began investigating psychic Linda Marks after two former clients accused her of exploiting them. Veronica Lynn Boys admitted she paid Marks $1.1 million during a seven-year period, including $150,000 cash on the spot at their first session, when Marks warned Boys of bad luck as a small snake emerged from an egg Marks had placed on a table. Also, an 88-year-old woman said she signed over her condo to Marks and paid $22,000 for furniture and improvements to it, under similar circumstances.

In Gainesville, Fla., in August, accused drug dealer Marcus Isom, 26, was convicted of ordering the murder of Lemuel Larkin, who he believed stole from him. According to testimony, Isom had consulted both Georgia spiritual adviser "The Root Man" and "Miss Cleo's" psychic hotline to find out who scammed him, and both gave descriptions that led Isom to finger Larkin.

Democracy in action (part I)

In the June debate between Republican candidates for Alabama secretary of state, Dave Thomas heatedly challenged Dean Young to a fistfight. And immediately after a June Democratic Party meeting in Atlantic City, N.J., the head of a challenging faction and the head of the eventually victorious incumbent faction pulled knives on each other. And East Palo Alto, Calif., school board candidate Leland Francois said he would remain on the November ballot despite disclosure that his only legal residence in the district was a vacant lot that housed his van, sleeping bag and portable stove. And disbarred lawyer Mike Schaefer announced he was running simultaneously (and legally) for a county office in Las Vegas, Nev., and the GOP nomination for an Arizona congressional seat.

Least competent criminals

The Lost Art of Disguises: Hit man Paul Bryan, 41, was sentenced to life in prison in May for three shootings after witnesses were able to identify him under his mask because he had cut the eye holes so large. And Michael Steven Pavlich, 48, was charged with trying to rob a Circle K store in September wearing a plastic foam cooler on his head. He was unsuccessful, in part because the cooler made it impossible for the clerk to understand what Pavlich was saying.

Up in smoke

Cats whose guardians smoke are up to three times more likely to develop lymphoma, according to a Tufts University Veterinary School researcher. And Yvonne Stubbs told a reporter she was trying hard to quit smoking because her Jack Russell terrier, Patch, has developed a 20-butt-a-day chewing habit from raiding her ashtrays. Stubbs said she was considering nicotine patches (for Patch, not for herself).

In the last month

The Australian version of AAA (the NRMA) reported that, following a morning headlines tribute to the victims of Sept. 11, "thousands" of forgetful motorists called in with dead batteries. An inebriated man was convicted of firing his handgun down through the floor of his upstairs den (after an argument with his wife of 32 years) and fatally hitting her as she stood in the kitchen, pouring his booze down the sink. A 24-year-old man was cited for littering after he allegedly shaved his head and tossed the clippings over a fence into his neighbor's yard. A female official of Sweden's conservative Christian Democratic party publicly advocated more freedom for pornography, on the ground that it might improve the birth rate.

Megalomaniacs on parade

Turkmenistan's president Saparmurat Niyazov made two decrees five days apart in August, first changing the names of the seven days of the week and the 12 months of the year. For example, April became "Gurbansoltan-edzhe" (the name of Niyazov's mother), and Tuesday became "Young Day." In the second decree, 12-year life cycles were created, beginning with "childhood," "adolescence" (up to age 25), on up to "wise" (age 73 to 85) and "old" (to 97).

Exhibits show diverse opportunities of aeronautics

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Maria Melgarejo thinks her son wants to be a pilot when he grows up. He, however, has different plans.

"I don't want to be a pilot," Louis Melgarejo, 4, said. "I want to fly, but I just want to fly by myself."

Technology might not be advanced enough to allow Louis to fly without an aircraft, but the Aerospace and Aviation Show at Manhattan Town Center on Saturday and Sunday showcased ways people in the Manhattan area have gotten off the ground.

The Society of Automotive Engineers-Aero, a club of K-State students who design remote-controlled airplanes for competitions, had a plane on display.

The plane from last year's competition lifted 19.8 pounds off the ground, good enough for 19th place at an international competition.

Mark Harrison, senior in mechanical engineering, said the show was a good opportunity for publicity and to raise funds for this year's plane.

One club, however, is more extreme in its use of planes.

The Milford RCers fly remote-controlled combat planes at speeds upwards of 80 mph during combat competitions.

The contestants attempt to cut off streamers from other planes in midair, Mitch Eaves, secretary of the club, said.

"If the planes collide in midair," Eaves said, "they just explode."

Flying combat planes is a relatively cheap hobby, Eaves said.

A plane can be built for less than $200, and repairs after a wreck usually only cost $35.

The club is having a combat competition at 10 a.m. Saturday at Farnum Creek at Milford Lake. Eaves said spectators are welcome to attend.

Not all exhibits focused on remote-controlled airplanes, though.

K-State-Salina was at the show distributing information about its aviation programs.

Mandi Bellamy, freshman in airway science, said many high school students and adults showed interest in the program.

"We've had a fair amount of interest," Bellamy said. "But a lot of people don't realize K-State has an aviation program."

Bellamy said the show was a good way to promote the program and recruit potential students.

This was the second year for the Aerospace and Aviation Show, said Randy Crow, manager of Manhattan Town

Center. Crow said the show offers an interesting appeal to the community. "It has opportunities for recreation, career tracks and a lot of neat things," Crow said. One of these fun activities was a plane-coloring contest for children, in which Louis Melgarejo was competing. Louis seemed optimistic that he would be able to fly by himself.

"No," he said, when asked if he had wings. "Not yet."

Attack on Arafat's compound does not help peace process

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The White House said Sunday that Israel's assault on Yasser Arafat's compound did not help the Middle East peace process and that Palestinian hopes for an independent state are greatly harmed by suicide attacks.

"Israel's actions in and around the (Arafat compound) are not helpful in reducing terrorist violence or promoting Palestinian reforms," White House spokeswoman Jeanne Mamo said on the third day of the Israeli operation at Arafat's once-sprawling headquarters.

"We urge Israel to continue considering the consequences of its actions on progress" toward reaching goals President Bush has set: Palestinian elections next year, Arafat's removal as leader of the Palestinians and creation of a Palestinian state within three years to exist peacefully with Israel.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said his country remains committed to Bush's ideas but insisted: "The Palestinian fate is in the hands of the Palestinians."

A suicide bombing Wednesday killed an Israeli policeman, ending a relative lull that lasted six weeks and raised hopes that two years of violence might be winding down. Five Israelis and a Scottish seminary student were killed in a Thursday suicide bombing on a Tel Aviv bus, claimed by the Islamic militant Hamas group.

A top Arafat aide, Nabil Abu Rdenah, told CNN he feared "a real massacre" if the standoff at the compound should erupt into a confrontation.

"We are in need of an immediate American intervention to stop this, because if this happens, this will reflect negatively on us and on Israelis and on the Americans themselves," he said.

Mamo said the White House saw progress in recent months toward Bush's goals. But renewed Israel-Palestinian violence complicates the administration's effort to rally world opinion for the ouster of Saddam Hussein.

The White House's words of warning to Israel were also notable because during other waves of violence, the Bush administration has generally criticized Palestinian suicide attacks far more sharply than Israeli retaliations.

The Israeli assault on Arafat's compound left him surrounded, and some U.S. officials worried that it could allow him to cast himself as a victim and a hero.

Four Palestinian demonstrators were killed by army fire in Gaza and the West Bank on Sunday, and a Palestinian teenager was killed in Nablus, residents said.

Israel got a firm expression of support from Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., chairman of the House International Relations Committee.

"Suicide bombing is a weapon that is pretty hard to deter," he said on CNN.

"If someone has a better idea than what the Israelis are doing, I'm sure (Prime Minister) Ariel Sharon would listen to it, but right now, I would find it hard to criticize them, although I would caution for both sides to stop the killing."

The White House would not respond publicly Sunday to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's plea that Bush intervene immediately to stop the Israeli operation.

TO THE POINT Student input essential for fair policies

There is nothing we can change now about the decrease in Hale Library hours.

But university administrators can change the way they go about solving fund shortages.

Earlier this semester, library officials used data from the Information Technology Assistance Center to determine which hours should be cut.

Regular library hours end at midnight instead of 2 a.m. The decision was made without student input. University officials failed to consult students to determine the new operating hours. More than a few library employees should have been consulted before making a final decision.

Student Senate has started a petition to get the library hours extended back to 2 a.m. The administration says there is no way that will be possible – the university just does not have the funds.

It would be nice if money was available to keep the library open a few more hours each night, but students and faculty need to understand library hours cannot be extended at this time.

The obvious solution is to take money-saving measures. But this solution is best carried out when students and others are given the chance to voice their opinions.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

UNENDING SUPPORT

Dependence on God doesn't exonerate friends from duty

Editor's note: Lorena is an international student from Costa Rica, majoring in education. You can e-mail her at lorena@ksu.edu. Every Monday, she will tackle an issue in her native language, Spanish, as well as English. Both columns convey the same message and allow the Collegian to reach a more diverse audience.

Sometimes writing a column is very rewarding, especially when you find another human being looking in the same direction, sharing the ideals, feelings and emotions that create the wonderful common denominator of humanity.

That rewarding moment was when I received a message from Xuemei Yang, an international and doctoral student in curriculum and instruction, who referred to my previous column "Life Support" in the Sept. 9 Collegian:

"I was impressed," she wrote two weeks ago, "by your article in today's Collegian. Yes, it is not enough to say 'We pray for you to get well' like many people do. They do need more than that. But, they may feel ill at ease. People are unlikely to understand how much pain the patients are experiencing physically and emotionally. "What I want to add is that the patients' suffering has an end. But the deep emotional suffering of their families or loved ones may last forever. Sometimes the emotional suffering is more painful. But people have even less understanding and compassion for the family members or their loved ones.

"In theory, God can solve any problems. In practice, none of our problems have ever been solved by God. My personal experience is that it is stupid to place hope on God, and it is even more stupid to place hope on people. What I want to say is that not only the patients but also their loved ones need to hug, to kiss, to cry, to listen, to talk, to share the mysterious drama of life and death," Xuemei said.

I have been thinking about what Xuemei says. Her point about the families of cancer patients is very relevant. Our society not only turns the cancer patient into a myth, but those around them are forgotten. The death of a loved one will be there for the rest of their lives, and nobody seems to notice.

Xuemei rejects that "theoretical and socially convenient" God who lets people face suffering and feel exonerated of providing support and help and compassion because that is God's job. She also finds it absurd to think that a physician, a scientist or a therapist will solve a human being's problems.

In our over-commercialized society, compassion has become a commodity. The solidarity between two human beings who have to face the inexplicable mystery of death, the Christian love that is there to hold the hand of somebody dying, the Buddhist compassionate love that tries to prevent the suffering of any creature, the simple noble heart that simply is always there when it is needed – these are lost under the greedy business of medical and psychological care.

Love has become an industry. It is no longer just a market of bodies but of souls as well.

The supermarket of advice, understanding, solidarity, compassion, love and care puts everything on sale.

Parents are too busy to make their children feel they are loved. Older people are forgotten and stored in those cemetery waiting rooms – nursing homes.

Yes, Xuemei, let's create the Heart and Souls Liberation Front.

Vamos a crear el frente de almas y corazones liberados

Algunas veces escribir una columna es muy satisfactorio, especialmente cuando se encuentra a otro ser humano mirando en la misma dirección, compartiendo ideales, sentimientos y emociones que crean el maravilloso común denominador de la humanidad.

Ese importante momento lo tuve cuando recibí el mensaje de Xuemei Yang, una estudiante internacional del doctorado en currículo e instrucción, referido a mi columna previa "Cáncer no puede invadir nuestra esperanza," 9 Septiembre Collegian:

En su mensaje de hace dos semanas, ella escribió "Me impresionó su artículo aparecido en el Collegian de hoy. Sí, no es suficiente decir 'Oramos para que su salud mejore' como mucha gente acostumbra. Ellos necesitan más que eso. Pero, ellos pueden sentirse molestos. Es poco probable que la gente entienda cuán dolorosa es la experiencia física y emocional de los pacientes.

"Lo que quiero añadir es que el sufrimiento de los pacientes tiene un final. Pero el profundo sufrimiento emocional de sus familias o sus seres queridos puede durar para siempre. Algunas veces el sufrimiento emocional es más doloroso. Pero la gente tiene aún menos entendimiento y compasión hacia los miembros de sus familias y seres queridos.

"En teoría, Dios puede resolver cualquier problema; en la práctica ningún problema ha sido jamás resuelto por Dios. Mi experiencia personal es: es estúpido tener esperanza en Dios, y es aún más estúpido tener esperanza en la gente. Lo que quiero decir es que no solo los pacientes sino también sus seres queridos necesitan abrazar, besar, llorar, hablar, compartir el misterioso drama de la vida y de la muerte," Xuemei escribió.

He estado pensando en lo dicho por Xuemei. Su referencia a las familias de pacientes con cáncer es relevante. Nuestra sociedad no solo convierte a los pacientes de esta enfermedad en mitos, sino que también olvida a quienes les rodean. La muerte de un ser querido, estará allí por el resto de sus vidas, y nadie parece notar.

Xuemei rechaza a ese Dios "teórico y socialmente conveniente," que deja a la gente sufrir y la exonera de proveer apoyo, ayuda y compasión debido a que ese es el trabajo de Dios. Ella también encuentra absurdo pensar que un médico, un científico o un terapeuta vaya a resolver los problemas humanos de alguien.

En nuestra sobre comercializada sociedad, la compasión se ha convertido en una mercancía. La solidaridad entre dos seres humanos que han tenido que enfrentar el inexplicable misterio de la muerte, el amor cristiano que hace que alguien solo esté allí para sostener la mano agonizante de alguien moribundo, el amor compasivo del budista que trata de salvar del sufrimiento a cualquier criatura, el simple y noble corazón que siempre está disponible cuando es necesitado – todo se pierde bajo el avariento negocio del cuidado médico y psicológico.

El amor se ha convertido en una industria. Ya no es solamente el mercado de cuerpos, es el de lavanta de almas también. El supermercado del consejo, del entendimiento, la solidaridad, la compasión, el amor y el cuidado tiene todo en venta.

Los padres de familia están muy ocupados para hacer sentir a sus hijos que son amados. Los adultos mayores son olvidados y "guardados" en esos cementerios de la espera – los asilos de ancianos.

Sí, Xuemei, vamos a crear el Frente de Liberación de los Corazones y las Almas.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

Hey, Mr. Mark Maston, when you start paying my tuition, privilege fees, books and supplies every year, then you can talk about attending class on tax-payer money. Until then, shut up.

To the dork whose booger I found under my desk: Who does that?

I caught my roommate biting his toenails. Is that the grossest thing, or what?

Does anybody else find it interesting that athletes mysteriously appear in class on test days?

Friends don't let friends drink and take home ugly men.

Did anybody catch that Bill Cosby Show reunion the other night? Man, Rudy is hot!

Nothing makes a girl sexier than seeing her smile.

Why are all journalists bleeding-heart liberals?

Do you know why men can't get pregnant? Because they don't have uterus.

Hey, maybe if people would park in one space instead of two, we'd have enough parking spaces on campus.

Since 9/11 people could see a parking meter expiring as an act of terrorism.

Hey, Bill Snyder, how much are you going to pay the legal system next time to get your players off the hook?

If men smelled like chocolate, they'd be much more likely to attract women.

I'm a 21-year-old male, and I love romantic comedies. And no, I'm not gay.

Students must speak out against Israeli occupations

DESMOND TUTU

The end of apartheid stands as one of the crowning accomplishments of the past century, but we would not have succeeded without the help of international pressures – in particular, the divestment movement of the 1980s.

A similar movement has taken shape during the past six months, this time aiming at an end to the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory.

Divestment from apartheid South Africa was fought by ordinary people at the grassroots. Faith-based leaders informed their followers, union members pressured their companies' stockholders and consumers questioned their store owners. Students played an especially important role by compelling universities to change their portfolios. Eventually, institutions pulled the financial plug, and the South African government thought twice about its policies.

Similar moral and financial pressures on Israel are being mustered one person at a time. Students on more than 40 U.S. campuses are demanding a review of university investments in Israeli companies.

Ronnie Kasrils and Max Ozinsky, two Jewish heroes of the anti-apartheid struggle, recently published a letter titled "Not in My Name." Signed by several hundred other prominent Jewish South Africans, the letter drew an explicit analogy between apartheid and current Israeli policies.

Mark Mathabane and Nelson Mandela also have pointed out the relevance of the South African experience. To criticize the occupation is not to overlook Israel's strengths.

In a region where repressive governments and unjust policies are the norm, Israel is more democratic than its neighbors. This does not make dismantling the settlements any less a priority. Territorial ambition is equally illegal whether it occurs in slow motion, as with the Israeli settlers in the Occupied Territories, or in blitzkrieg fashion, as with the Iraqi tanks in Kuwait.

The United States has a distinct responsibility to intervene in atrocities committed by its client states, and since Israel is the single-largest recipient of U.S. arms and foreign aid, an end to the occupation of Palestinian territory should be a top concern.

Almost instinctively, the Jewish people have always been on the side of the voiceless. In their history, there is painful memory of massive roundups, house demolitions and collective punishment. In their scripture, there is acute empathy for the disfranchised. The occupation represents a dangerous and selective amnesia of the persecution from which these traditions were born.

The growing Israeli re-fusenik movement evokes the small anti-conscription drive that helped turn the tide in apartheid South Africa. Several hundred Israeli officers have refused to perform military service in the Occupied Territories. Those not already in prison have taken their message on the road, rightly arguing that Israel needs security, but that it will never have it as an occupying power.

More than 35 new settlements have been constructed in the past year. Each one is a step away from the safety deserved by the Israelis and two steps away from the justice owed to the Palestinians. If apartheid ended, so can the occupation, but the moral force and international pressure will have to be just as determined. The current divestment effort is the first, though certainly not the only, necessary move in that direction. We can only hope that U.S. students will continue taking the moral initiative.

Archbishop Desmond Tutu was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1984 for his work against apartheid.

LIBRARY | Budget cuts reduce chances of extending library's hours

them during the hours they need it."

Bridge said the biggest complaint Senate has heard is hours being moved from 2 a.m. to midnight on weekdays.

"If we expect students to get involved with campus activities and in their living groups, it's going to push study time back a couple hours," Bridge said. "We want students involved and also to be studying. We need to help them do as much as we can."

Bridge said that while an expansion of hours is what Senate wants, it will have to see what happens.

"We're not naive. We know the university and the entire state is in a financial crisis," Bridge said. "Any increase in library hours is what we're after."

Wefald and Hobrock said they would be open to a petition.

"We're waiting for and welcoming student input," Hobrock said.

However, with drastic underfunding because of state budget cuts, the possibility of extending library hours doesn't look promising.

"There is no money - we have allocated everything out, and there just isn't any large amount of money to take care of the problem," said John Struve, interim associate vice president for administration and finance.

Coffman said although he has heard student concerns about the hours, he doesn't see an extension in the near future.

"Not this semester," he said. "The library staff will keep an eye on that going on through the year, but don't count on it in the short term."

Hobrock said he wants students to know the problem doesn't lie with K-State.

"The students' beef is with the Legislature and the government," Hobrock said. "The library would like to work with students on achieving some level of understanding of this problem."

Wefald said the situation was a profound example of long-term budget cuts.

"There are more cuts to come," he said. "It's going to get worse before it's going to get better. It's going to get difficult - we'll be good listeners, though."

Also, companies have the right to call if information is requested or if a business relationship has been established in the preceding 36 months. However, under federal law, consumers can tell the company to cease contact.

Residents who do not make the first deadline still can register at any time. Their names, however, will be on subsequent lists. Companies are required to publish updated lists on or before the first of October, January, April and July of each year. The next deadline is Dec. 23.

Tritsch said consumers who feel they have been contacted illegally should record any possible information about the caller, including the person's name, address or the name of the company the person is representing. Complaints can be filed by calling 1-800-432-2310.

Richard Fogg, marketing instructor, said he was one of the first to register.

he was receiving. He received two to three calls a day. It was invading his privacy, he said.

"Of course, most of them were in the evening, so when you tried to have dinner or anything else, there was this unending string of phone calls," he said. "So not privacy in the sense they were getting personal information, but privacy in the sense they were invading my personal space when I would rather not be bothered."

He even discussed the act with his classes. They discussed consumer privacy issues and how response to the act suggests people are tired of the calls they receive.

"If the volume was decreased," he said, "I think there would be a higher level of tolerance and compliance among the consumers, but it simply has reached unacceptable levels, which is evidenced by the number of people who have opted to sign up for the list."

FESTIVAL | Fighting demonstration attracts large crowd to City Park

"There are more people here this year," said Kris, K-State graduate and folk-life demonstrator. "The crowd always has lots of questions after the fighting. That is why I am here - I do the research."

As for Lake, he didn't have any questions. He was just happy his cousin, Meghann Day, senior in interior design, took him to the festival.

"I had never come before, and he was in town," Day said. "So, I took him away, and we have been walking around looking at the different stuff."

That stuff included antique tractors, goat milking, inflatable rides, live entertainment and crafts too numerous to name.

One craft area featured live pottery demonstrations by the Manhattan Recreation Department pottery class. The group was selling its work to raise money for more pottery wheels - it only has two for 20 students.

"It is actually going a lot better than I expected," Mindy Hard, pottery instructor, said. "We have raised quite a bit of money."

But the festival wasn't all about work. Colleen Alexander, Manhattan resident, and her son, Trevor, 7, started at the Pioneer Park of the festival and made their way down the street.

"So far we have milked a goat," she said. "Well, I milked the goat because he wouldn't do it. Now we are looking for something else as exciting."

Trevor, however, knew they wouldn't have much trouble.

"Everything is pretty cool," he said.

Volleyball stops its 4-match losing skid

Wildcats pick up 1st Big 12 victory with 3-game sweep

K-STATE SPORTS INFORMATION

The women's volleyball team broke a four-match losing streak and picked up its first

Next Action

K-State will be in action on Wednesday when the team travels to Ames, Iowa, to face Iowa State. Opening serve is set at 7 p.m.

Big 12 Conference win of the season, as the Wildcats used serving and blocking to post a 30-17, 30-22, 30-23 win over Baylor on Saturday afternoon in front of 637 fans at the Ferrell Center.

With the win, K-State evens its record to 5-5 on the season and 1-1 in Big 12 Conference play, while Baylor dropped its second in a row to fall to 6-5 overall and 0-2 in league play. The Wildcats tallied 44 kills on a .301 hitting percentage with a season-tying 10 service aces and a season-best 13.5 total blocks.

The Bears were held to a paltry .104 hitting percentage in the match to go with four service aces, four service errors and just four blocks.

Junior outside hitter Cari Jensen paced a balanced K-State attack, as she tallied 12 on .333 hitting to go with a career-best four service aces. Junior middle blocker Lauren Goehring turned in an all-around impressive performance with nine kills, three aces, eight digs and three blocks. Sophomore setter Gabby Guerre totaled six kills on a team-best .667 hitting percentage, while sophomore middle blocker Lisa Martin tallied a career-best eight blocks to go with five kills.

Junior outside hitter Stevie Nicholas led the Baylor attack with a match-high 17 kills, while adding a team-best nine digs, two service aces and three blocks. Junior middle blocker Tisha Schwartz added 12 kills.

The two teams battled through eight ties before K-State ran off five straight points on the serve of Goehring for a 14-9 lead. Baylor would get a kill from Nicholas on the next play to close within one, but that would be the closest it would get, as the Wildcats closed the first game with three kills and a block for a 30-17 win. K-State hit a blistering .419 on a balanced attack with five players earning three kills, while the defense recorded a season-best seven blocks and held Baylor to a .000 hitting percentage. K-State jumped out to an early 6-3 lead in game two before Baylor rallied to tie the game at 9-all.

The two teams then battled through 11 ties and six lead changes before the Wildcats rattled off a 7-0 run, including six off the serve of Goehring, to take a commanding 26-20 lead. The Bears could get no closer than five points, as the Wildcats scored four of the last six points for a 30-22 win. Jensen paced the attack with five kills on no hitting errors, while Martin added four blocks.

In game three, K-State used an early 4-0 run on the serve of Guerre to open up a tight 5-4 en route to taking a 13-5 advantage. After Baylor closed to within 13-9, the Wildcats opened the gap once again, scoring five of the next seven points for an 18-11 lead.

The Bears again closed to within four points at 19-15. However, the Wildcats got a 5-0 run on the serve of Guerre and 4-0 run on Jensen's serve to take a commanding 28-16 lead. Baylor fought off five match points before falling 30-23.

The Cats return to action Wednesday when they travel to Ames, Iowa, to play Iowa State.

K-State puts wraps on USC offense, wins again

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's defense, relied upon on many times Saturday night to make stops against an effective Southern California offense, had to make one more stop to ensure a Cat win.

With 3:14 left in the fourth quarter, quarterback Eli Roberson fumbled the ball on the USC 12-yard line. The Trojans recovered the ball in the end zone, enabling the 11th-ranked team in the country to have one more shot at stealing the Cats' glory.

But the defense already had been accustomed to making sure mistakes wouldn't result in points for the opposition during K-State's 27-20 win over the Trojans.

A dropped punt by Terence Newman and a mishandled kickoff by linebacker

Terry Pierce already had been wiped clean by defensive holds.

With just over three minutes, though, this stop had a little more riding on it — perhaps the Cats' season.

"I think the guys were letting up a little bit, but not too much," defensive tackle Tank Reese said. "But we weren't tired. We knew we had to play hard defense."

USC started its final drive on its own 20. Quarterback Carson Palmer completed three consecutive passes, driving Southern California to the Cat 33-yard line.

But that's as far as the Trojans would get.

Tailback Malaefou MacKenzie was shut down for no gain on first down, Palmer's second-down pass fell incomplete, then Reese and Melvin Williams combined to sack Palmer on third down — a huge play for the Cats' confidence, Reese said.

"That was a great play, and to hear the crowd go crazy, man, it was nuts," he said. "That is what I love."

Palmer's deep effort on fourth down was out of reach for wide-receiver Keary Colbert, and K-State took over on downs. The defense had stepped up once again.

Pierce said what gave the defense confidence throughout the game was its play in the first half.

"The most pleasing was stuffing them in the first quarter," he said. "We let them know that Kansas State came to play. That was a slap in their face. I really believe that USC wasn't ready for that."

Southern California had just 86 total yards in the first half. Palmer was only eight of 22 passing, and the USC running

Roberson replaces Dunn, sparks Wildcat scoring drives

After beginning day on bench, backup spurs offensive production

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Eli Roberson had been there before.

A year ago against Southern California, Roberson was the guy — the Wildcats' starting quarterback.

Roberson had a stellar game running the ball against the Trojans in the Los Angeles Coliseum last year, rolling up 119 yards on 21 attempts.

The Cats took home a win that day, beating the Trojans 10-6. But Saturday, the Wildcats and Trojans were both different teams from what they had been a year before. And Roberson started the game on the sideline at Wagner Field.

Early on, it looked as though it might be another defensive struggle. USC's opening drive led to a punt. K-State's opening drive led to a blocked field goal. USC countered with a three-and-out, and K-State followed suit.

And when Eli Roberson replaced Marc Dunn as the K-State quarterback at the 12:52 mark of the second quarter, his opening drive also yielded a punt.

After USC got the ball and went three-and-out yet again, the Trojans had produced six punts on seven offensive possessions. K-State wasn't far behind, punting away four of five opportunities in the first and second quarters.

Neither offense had produced any points. But then things started to go a different direction.

Roberson and the Wildcats took over at their own 17 with 10:20 left in the second.

Roberson optioned out for three yards. He then hit Travis Wilson for a 10-yard gain. And aided by the efforts of Darren Sproles and Taco Wallace, in 13 plays K-State got the ball to the USC 18.

Jared Brite banged in a field goal to give the Cats their first lead of the game.

Following a fumble recovery on USC's next drive, K-State got the ball back on the USC 30. Roberson immediately took the snap and fired a 29-yard strike to Wallace.

The Cat quarterback then took it in himself, and the Wildcats had a 10-0 lead.

That lead would be

EXPLOSIVE FAILURE

Special effects
don't carry film

I can't believe they still make movies like this.

In an attempt to find the hot new Asian director, the producers of "Ballistic: Ecks vs. Sever" gave the green light to a horrible film.

A string of cheesy action sequences of people and/or things getting shot up or blown up held together loosely by a bad plot that could be told in a 23-minute episode of "MacGyver" does not make a good movie.

Nobody told that to Thai director Wych Kaosayananda, who is credited simply as Kaos.

Kaos became renowned for making "Fah," the biggest-budgeted movie ever made in Thailand.

His techno-backed Asian action comes off as pure cheese in "Ballistic: Ecks vs. Sever."

And we're not talking kitsch-value good cheese like "Godzilla" or a Jackie Chan movie.

This is one of the worst action movies ever. Every single action movie cliché is worked overtime.

No reloads, tough-talking unshaven Dirty Harry wannabe cops and bad guys who actually look and act like characters from "MacGyver" all combine to make this movie laughably bad.

The sinister agent Gant's son is kidnapped by Charlie's Angel Lucy Liu while carrying a microscopic killer in his blood stream.

Former agent Ecks is promised he can reunite with his wife, whom he thought was dead, if he tracks down the kidnapper.

Then there's explosions, guns, kung fu and slow-motion shots.

Then the good guys win, Kenny Loggins-esque music plays, and the movie ends.

Who knows why Liu and acting veteran Antonio Banderas took these roles. Maybe people thought the movie would be good.

Banderas should never play another role that requires him to keep his two-day stubble the entire time. It is not flattering.

Avoid this movie at all costs. There is no reason to see it, because it has all been done before, and it has been done better. Just go rent "Die Hard" or something.

Ice Cube's latest provides

Trading between snips of humor and social consciousness, "Barbershop" creates a style as flamboyant and expressive as the biggest Afro.

Ice Cube stars as Calvin, the recent inheritor of a barbershop in Chicago. The shop has been Calvin's family trade since his grandfather founded the establishment in the 1950s. But heritage alone can't pay the bills, and the shop is barely sustaining itself.

Calvin has bigger dreams, like producing platinum-selling records from a basement recording studio. But these dreams never materialized, and Calvin is in financial trouble from investing in several failed get-rich-quick schemes.

Searching for a way to make a quick profit from the barbershop, Calvin impulsively sells the property to a loan shark for $20,000. Through the course of the day in which the film is set, Calvin comes to realize that the barbershop isn't just a commercial enterprise but a cultural institution.

With a renewed reverence for his forefathers' endowment, Calvin resolves to buy back the shop from the loan shark who raised the price.

Thankfully, Cube's leading role is more equivalent to his work in "Three Kings" and the original "Friday" than "All About the Benjamins" or "Next Friday." His character is reserved while intriguing and articulate.

Cube's solid performance as the mundane Calvin brings together the rest of the excellent cast. The ruckus between the employees and patrons of the barbershop is executed deftly thanks to a well-written script and the rest of the cast. The dialogue is consistently smooth and vibrant, not to mention voiceful and funny.

Cedric the Entertainer, sporting a Frederick Douglass-esque hairdo, has his most memorable role yet.

Cedric plays Eddie, the eldest resident barber who has an intense passion for the art of shaving and trimming but never seems to have a customer. Having all that free time gives Eddie an opportunity to voice his unconventional opinions, including his three things black people need to know: Rodney King deserved to get beaten, O.J. did it and all Rosa Parks did was sit down.

"Ryde or Die Chick" Eve is surprisingly good in her acting debut, which will likely help create another crossover career. Hopefully both Eve and Ice Cube will realize they don't have to take every role offered to them (remember "Anaconda" or "Ghosts from Mars"?). And focus on making worthwhile movies like "Barbershop."

New Beck album fits artistic pattern;
introspective effort is listener friendly

Beck and his music have many qualities, but stagnance is not one of them.

Ever since "Mellow Gold," Beck has been changing, but patterns have been a part of his work. On the exterior, album covers alternate between absurd artwork and welcoming portraits of the artist. Respectively, the material cycles from light-hearted booty-shakers to heartfelt tear-jerkers.

The cover of Beck's latest album, "Sea Change," features a closeup of him, looking somewhat dazed and haggard, accented by bright colors radiating from his eyes and ears. According to the formula, the album should be subdued and introspective. It is, and it's Beck's best work in the variety.

"Sea Change" counters the all-night dance party that was "Midnight Vultures" with some of the most intimate and solemn songs that Beck has released. "Midnight Vultures" was the soundtrack for midnight Saturday, but "Sea Changes" resonates for 6 a.m. Sunday morning.

The album features a soft and embellished acoustic folk sound that could be compared to 1998's "Mutations," but is more parallel to the relatively obscure 1994 K Records release, "One Foot in the Grave."

"SEA CHANGE"

Album review by Adam Lee

There is still some grooviness that has carried over from the last album. The second track, "Paper Tiger" provides a good transition between styles and should please all Beck fans. It has the sharp beat, funky bass and tight bending guitar that helped make "Midnight Vultures" so infectious. But here they are offset by surging strings arranged by Beck Hansen's father.

The lyrics are far more serious than his previous songs that often feature goofy, nonsensical lines. The album also has an obvious influence from the Parisian duo, Air, whom Beck collaborated with on "10,000Hz Legend."

"Sea Changes" is more listener friendly than usual. Beck has had a tendency in the past to include some tracks on his albums that can be rather aggravating. But on "Sea Changes" Beck consistently creates songs that are potentially harmonious and melodic.

Beck continues to be one of the most profound and prolific modern artists. His masterful duality is something that is extraordinarily rare and should be treasured.

USC | K-State uses timely defense, opportunistic special teams play to grab 2nd win over USC in as many years

attack was held to a mere 41 yards.

Coach Bill Snyder said he was pleased with what the defense did against Palmer and the deep corps of Trojan receivers.

"I can certainly point to the fact that after Tony Romo came in here and completed the first 12 passes he threw, we did a pretty good job on Carson Palmer," Snyder said. "And everything I thought about those receivers is true -- all of them will play on Sunday, and I thought our defense made some great strides at defending the pass."

Southern California's defense also slowed down the Cat offense to start the game.

Roberson replaced Marc Dunn as quarterback early in the second quarter and got the ball moving better than it was.

The first score of the game came when K-State put together a 14-play drive, setting up a Jared Brite field goal.

The Cats' next possession resulted in a touchdown throw from Roberson to Taco Wallace, after K-State's defense recovered a Kareem Kelly fumble on the USC 30-yard line.

But the Trojan defense made a play of its own.

USC safety Troy Polamalu blind-sided Roberson on the Cats' next possession, forcing the fumble. Mike Patterson recovered the loose ball and took it into the end zone for the score.

K-State's special teams blocked the PAT try, and Newman took the ball 90 yards for two points.

"I thought at first I would just get tackled," Newman said. "I saw a couple of seams, and my guys were making blocks. I just got to the point where I was looking for a time to coast, because I was getting tired."

Newman's return sent the Cats into the locker room leading 12-6.

Snyder said, though, that it shouldn't have been that close.

Roberson's fumble came with just 1:35 left in the quarter.

"It was 12-6 at halftime, and it shouldn't have been that," Snyder said. "It should have been 10-0, and we go in to the locker room shutting them out."

But the Cats distanced themselves from the Trojans early in the second half, with the help of Roberson and running back Darren Sproles.

Sproles rushed for 52 yards (78 for the game) and a touchdown while Roberson completed seven of eight passes in the second half.

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said Saturday's win was all about making plays.

The defense stepped in the first half to shut down the USC offense, and the Cat offense had guys play above and beyond their abilities in the second half, he said.

"We had some guys making some big plays for us right now," Hudson said.

"You got to have guys doing that -- that's true in any sport you're playing. We almost shot ourselves in the foot on that last drive, but we had guys making plays, and that helped us win."

QUARTERBACK | Roberson relieves Dunn during 2nd quarter to lead Cats to 27-20 upset win over Trojans

stretched all the way to 27-6, powered by a 13-yard running score from Sproles and a 9-yard, fourth-quarter touchdown pass from Roberson to James Terry.

Before Roberson came into the game, the Wildcats had produced just 43 yards of total offense.

And as the Cats sprinted into the locker room with a 27-20 victory over the No. 11 team in the country, the offense had totaled 347 total yards.

Roberson, in some way, was responsible for 231 of those yards.

Following the game, Coach Bill Snyder was asked about his decision to put Roberson into the ball game.

"Why not?" Snyder said.

"But he didn't play very well -- not like he's capable of."

While Roberson did have some success, completing 10 of 15 passes for 134 yards and a touchdown, he short-armed several passes and missed some open receivers.

"As a passer, he didn't do some of the things that I'd like him to be able to do," Snyder said. "And I know he's a lot better, but he didn't throw the ball as well as he had in some of the earlier games this season, and I understand how and why that took place."

But, Snyder added, though he had some issues with consistency, Roberson did play well enough to get the win.

"As far as his leadership was concerned, I think he was fine," he said. "He was pretty methodical and had a decent understanding of what he was doing. He wasn't making a lot of mistakes as far as what he was getting us into -- and out of."

Roberson said what he was interested in getting into was the game.

"Coach let me know that I did some good things against them last year and that he was going to call my number," Roberson said. "He told me to just stay ready and know what to do.

"I just went out there and tried to perform."

So, after a performance that depended on Roberson,

K-State is 4-0. And Roberson is the guy again.

Maybe.

"I don't know," Roberson said. "It's a battle. It's going to be a battle every day. 'Starter' doesn't mean anything here anymore."

diversity Manhattan has. "We learn to see ourselves as individuals and not as stereotypes," Harmes said.

Candi Pitts, co-chair of the event, offers students some advice for choosing which events to attend.

"We tell our students to look at the calendar and look at something that will challenge them and allow them to grow," Pitts said. "Choose an event where some of your old perceptions might be cleared up, and give yourself a chance to stretch."

Learning about different cultures has become more significant since Sept. 11, Pitts said.

"It's much more important to think about the community, not just around us but around the world," she said.

"When people engage in learning about other cultures, not only do they learn a lot — they also learn a lot about themselves."

Harmes said the Sept. 11 tragedy reinforced the goal of

"We want to bring awareness, and we understand it is not built overnight. This is our 15th year and is something we have to maintain every year," Harmes said.

Maintaining goals helps combat hate crimes, Benson said. He said after Sept. 11 he saw the benefits of the week by students' responses.

These positive movements can be attributed to the community of K-State and Manhattan, Benson said.

"A lot of credit is due to administrators, faculty, staff and students who worked tirelessly before that to promote the benefits of diversity in our personal and professional lives," Benson said. "We hope to keep that spirit going."

Waterski accident injures student

Athlete hospitalized after larynx surgery

By Lynne Hermansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A student was injured in a sports related accident over the weekend.

Jessica Ervin, junior in mass communications, was injured while competing with the Waterski Team at the Great Plains Conference Championship in DuQuoin, Ill. near Southern Illinois University.

Ervin, the KSDB-FM 91.9 underwriting director, was jumping in the tournament when her neck was caught in the tow-rope and tow-rope handle. She was taken to a hospital where she underwent larynx surgery.

As of Monday, Ervin was in stable condition at St. Louis University Hospital.

This is her third year in the K-State Waterski Club.

E-mailboxes can be monitored by students

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Webmail account users need to keep their e-mailboxes clean or access problems will arise again, said the director of Computing & Network Services.

To help, a Web site was created that allows users to monitor their mailbox size. Five megabytes or less per e-mailbox are recommended.

CNS Director Harvard Townsend said last week's access problems were due to a multitude of mailboxes that were 20 megabytes or larger, which slowed down the system.

Professors aim to revive Kansas poll

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the 2002 elections getting closer, many Kansans are left wondering what they can do to get their political opinions heard.

John Murray, professor of family studies and human development, has the answer for them.

Murray wants to reinstate the Kansas Poll.

The Kansas Poll was a random survey taken of Kansans

FEEDING THE NEED

Matt Jensen, student at the University of Nebraska, stands on the corner of College Heights and Kimball looking for tickets to the K-State — USC game. Jensen collects tickets and resells them to make a profit.

Scalpers provide another opportunity for tickets; authorities cracking down on second-hand sales

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On the corner of College Heights Road and Kimball Avenue, Matt Jensen, a student at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, gets to work.

As cars stop at the intersection, he holds up a bright yellow sign reading "I Need Tickets" and yells for their attention as they pass him. Some drivers stop and talk about ticket prices while others just pass by.

Each week, Jensen goes to the top college football games around Nebraska and Kansas, trying to make money by purchasing tickets for an affordable price, then turning around and selling them at a higher price.

"I get here early and buy the tickets," he said. "Then I sell them higher than what I paid for."

Jensen was among the many salesmen who crowded the sidewalks of Kimball Avenue on Saturday afternoon trying to buy and sell tickets to the football game between K-State and USC.

However, with the university's policy of no solicitation on any school property and various athletic department rules, Kimball Avenue was the closest that ticket sellers could get to the stadium without the K-State Police stepping in.

Although Kansas law states it is not illegal to scalp tickets, certain university policies come into effect, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

"There are no laws in Kansas on scalping tickets," he said. "But what it falls back to is the fact that you can't sell anything on K-State property without a license."

Moreover, with the increase in attendance at the home football games, the K-State police officers are beginning to enforce all-university policies more strictly.

"We have begun enforcing the policy because we started having problems with professional ticket brokers earlier this season," said Jim Muller, assistant associate director of Bramlage Coliseum. "We've had issues with both the professionals and fans going to ticket lines and disrupting those people trying to buy tickets."

In addition, Casey Scott, associate athletic director, said ticket sellers take away the positive atmosphere and, more importantly, the school's ticket sales.

Each week, Jensen goes to the top college football games around Nebraska and Kansas, trying to make money by purchasing tickets for an affordable price, then turning around and selling them at a higher price.

"When you have professional, well-organized groups moving in, we don't think it has a good presence, and we don't like the looks of it," Scott said. "We have the right to move those people off our property, and our athletic director is intent on accomplishing that."

"And again, it goes back to protecting our own sales," he said. "We don't want our fans having to walk past folks who are always asking them if they always have tickets to sell or tickets to give them. That's not part of the atmosphere we want to have at our football games."

Muller agreed, adding that the strict

Small-town students receive international scholarship

Amber Brazle, junior, and Felicia Walker, senior, both in animal science and industry, received a $500 Rodolfo Montes de Oca/Cosa Rica-Small Town International Scholarship. The scholarship fund was created by a 1993 graduate and is awarded to students from rural Kansas communities.

1993 alumnus contributes $20,000 donation; students from rural communities reap benefits

By Lynne Hermansen
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Small town life really does have its rewards.

Amber Brazle, junior, and Felicia Walker, senior, both in animal science and industry, received a new scholarship for the 2002 school year, partly because of their small-town upbringings.

The Rodolfo Montes de Oca/Costa Rica-Small Town International Scholarship, established by the KSU Foundation, gives financial assistance to students from small rural Kansas communities.

Brazle and Walker each received a $500 scholarship.

Montes de Oca, a 1993 alumnus, graduated with a bachelor's degree in marketing. He now manages a family-owned book distribution business in San Jose, Calif. He donated $20,000 to the Foundation, according to a press release.

Gwyn Hwang, international programs director for the Foundation, said this scholarship is unique because Montes de Oca is a young donor.

"It is great that he is so willingly to do this," she said. "And his giving back to K-State right away is so meaningful."

Hwang said Montes de Oca wanted to let other students experience his home country.

"People in small towns were most helpful when he was here, and he wanted to be able to give back to them," she said.

Walker, who is from Meriden, Kan., was unavailable for comment.

Brazle, who is from Chanute, Kan., said she wrote a required essay for the scholarship application in an animal science class.

The essay focused on why she considered her town to be small.

She said she didn't base the essay on the size of her town, but the small-town atmosphere. Brazle said she actually went to high school in neighboring town Erie, Kan., and graduated with a class of 40.

FACES IN THE CROWD

Heston plays up 'Ben-Hur' for laughs at fund-raiser

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Charlton Heston joked about his Oscar-winning "Ben-Hur" role during a Republican break-fast fund-raiser.

Heston, who recently announced he has symptoms consistent with Alzheimer's disease, said his chariot-driving teacher in Italy told him to just "Stay in the chariot. I'll guarantee you're going to win," the race.

"And I did," the 78-year-old actor and conservative activist said Friday.

Heston spoke only for a few minutes, reading from a file card when talking about the Alabama campaign.

Heston was last in Mobile in 1996, campaigning for U.S. Sen. Jeff Sessions, who's running for re-election against Democrat Susan Parker.

Sessions told Heston, "You have won the real race of life. You did not choose to sit on the sidelines and watch it."

The $100-a-plate breakfast drew 250 people, with funds going to the Alabama Republican Party.

New Mrs. America crowned

Alabama youth pastor Kristi Leigh Phillips was crowned Mrs. America at the 26th annual pageant.

Phillips, 25, of Montgomery, will represent the United States at the Mrs. World competition Dec. 15 in Bucharest, Romania.

"I'm a little southern belle from Alabama, and going to Romania is something I probably would never have got to do. So I'm very excited," Phillips said after she was crowned Friday.

Phillips and her husband, Brian, have a 2-year-old daughter.

Charity Kelly, 26, of Blaine, Minn., was first runner-up, followed by Allison Meeks Hood, 26, of Midville, Ga., and Helen Berger, 30, of Honolulu.

The Mrs. America pageant will be broadcast Oct. 12 on the Pax TV network.

Redford backing candidate

Macomb County Prosecutor Carl Marlinga's run for Congress is getting Hollywood support: an endorsement from Robert Redford.

Marlinga's first paid advertisement is a testimonial from Redford, who is deeply involved in environmental issues. It began airing on radio this week, the Detroit Free Press reported Saturday.

Redford touts Marlinga's record as a fighter for a cleaner Lake St. Clair and urges voters to protect Michigan's environment.

Marlinga, a Democrat, faces Republican Secretary of State Candice Miller on Nov. 5 for the new 10th Congressional District.

Boxer sentenced to life

Floyd "Jumbo" Cummings, who fought former heavyweight boxing champion Joe Frazier to a 10-round draw in 1981, was sentenced to life in prison under Illinois' "three-strikes" law.

Judge Joseph Kazmierski Jr. handed down the sentence on Friday after Cummings was convicted of armed robbery for stealing $250 and a videocassette recorder from a fast-food restaurant in 2000. It was Cummings' third felony conviction.

TO THE POINT Scalpers doing service to those without tickets

Ticket scalping might be a nuisance to Athletic Director Tim Weiser and his staff, but regardless of whether he likes it, the scalpers are not going anywhere.

Athletic department representatives say ticket scalpers disrupt the atmosphere at KSU Stadium and don't serve a purpose for students.

This view is not entirely correct because many students, specifically freshmen and sophomores, still are searching for tickets come gameday.

The ticket scalpers are doing the students a service by offering these tickets.

This is similar to students selling their tickets to friends during the week.

The only difference is that the tickets sold by scalpers will be significantly more expensive than the athletic department's price.

But if the students are willing to pay these hefty prices, whose right is it to complain about it?

The athletic department may be justified in its decision to keep them out of the stadium, but the scalpers are not leaving Kimball Avenue any time soon — the money is just too good.

Until this becomes a nuisance to individual students, the ticket scalpers should continue to sell their tickets to willing buyers.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Premature balding among men something to be proud, not ashamed of God made a few perfect heads. On the rest, he put hair.

This is the credo of the bald and proud. I'm sure someone is probably reading this and thinking I'm crazy for writing about premature baldness in a collegiate publication. College people might think it is an issue better left to our parents or grandparents, but have you looked around campus lately?

Premature balding men are everywhere.

Or maybe it just seems that way to me since my sparse-scalped, 24-year-old significant other is one of them. Biased or not, I commend the prematurely balding male. I encourage him to abandon his baseball cap and comb-over so the entire world may appreciate his hairline, or lack thereof.

Why do I show such veneration for the diminishing hairline?

Several reasons:

NASRINA BURNETT

1. Attitude. I've found that men with larger-than-average foreheads are often far more sensitive and mature than their thick-haired counterparts. Even though these men might or might not be older in years, they have learned to use something other than their youthful good looks to impress people. I don't have anything against boyish charm, but it is the more sophisticated man who gets my vote every time.

2. No surprises.

By the time they reach the age of 35 or 40, two-thirds of all men have visible signs of hair loss. Ladies, if you're going to commit to a man for the long haul, you might as well make sure you've got a clear idea of what he'll look like in 10 years. Gentlemen, if you know now your hairline isn't something that is going to stick around, you will be much better prepared to circumvent a potential mid-life crisis.

3. Viagra-free.

An abundance of the hormone dihydrotestosterone, or DHT, has been scientifically linked to lessening a man's mane. This same hormone has been proportionally correlated to sex drive, as well as erectile capabilities. Most women are a little turned off when they find out their man is popping the little blue pill. Luckily, a balding man can be pill-free and potent into his later years. The longer a man keeps his hair, the shorter he keeps his ...

4. Bald is beautiful.

Patrick Stewart is still considered sexy, and nobody can remember what he looked like when he did have hair. Another example is Andre Agassi. His hairless head landed him the love of both actress Brooke Shields and tennis star Steffi Graf. Agassi is undeniably sexy and has the track record to prove it. Anyone who has ever rubbed a bald head knows there is just something enticing about the nakedness of a hair-free head.

5. Grooming.

Less hair equals less maintenance. Bald men don't have to worry about getting windblown or digging disgusting clumps of hair out of the shower drain. Plus, think of the money that could be saved if you didn't have to buy shampoo. Without hair, regular soap is all you need to cleanse your head.

I hope prematurely balding men will hold their sparsely covered heads up with pride. As for the gentlemen out there who still have a full head of hair, feel free to shave it off so that you, too, can have all the benefits of going bald.

As for me, I just wish I could pull off the bare-headed look.

I guess I could start a trend.

Students should support education system by volunteering at schools

We need your help. By this time, school will have started in classrooms throughout Kansas. The start of a new school year often is met with some trepidation on the part of students.

This year, I'm afraid the same can be said of teachers and administrators.

Each year, our schools and educators are challenged to meet the needs of a diverse group of students while satisfying the public's need for accountability. It is a big job, but Kansas educators approach it with zeal.

This year, as we begin implementing the provisions of the most sweeping federal education legislation in several decades, the expectations on our schools will be greater than ever before.

While coping with these changes, Kansas educators also are dealing with financial pressures brought on by the state's fiscal problems. Our educators are being asked to do more than ever before with considerably less.

As you might imagine, this creates a great deal of frustration and anxiety among those in the education field. Although I hear about these frustrations, I am pleased, but not surprised, to find that teachers and administrators in Kansas continue to put the good of students above all else.

Our educators are to be applauded for their efforts and their determination. I have already expressed to Kansas educators my personal support for their efforts on behalf of children.

Recently, Gov. Bill Graves showed his support for schools and educators in our state by declaring September 2002 "Support Public Schools Month" in Kansas.

In signing the proclamation declaring Support Public Schools Month, Gov. Graves called on citizens from all our communities to support education by getting involved in their local schools.

I would like to make the same plea.

In this year of added challenges, educators need your support more than ever.

Please, take a few minutes to help Kansas educators help our children.

Often, people believe there is little they can do to support education that will be "substantial enough" to make a difference.

I can tell you that there is no effort that is insubstantial. Making a difference can be as simple as taking the time to thank an educator for the job he or she is doing.

There are other things you can do to assist schools in educational efforts. Here are just a few:

1) Call your local school and find out what volunteer opportunities are available. You might be able to assist by making copies, preparing class materials, etc.

2) Participate in school events.

3) Help chaperone a class field trip.

4) Find out if your local schools need supplies that your company or service organization can donate.

5) Make a special effort to attend a school activity to support that program and the district.

6) Educate yourself about the performance and the needs of your local schools.

7) Let your legislators know of your support for schools.

In other words, get involved. We need you.

I have been proud to be a part of Kansas education for nearly 32 years. Despite the challenges we still face, we have made great progress in bringing the majority of our students to educational excellence.

I do not want to see the progress we have made eroded.

I am asking for your help in supporting our schools and our educators as they strive to successfully educate all of our children.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

The problem with having a president inducted into the Scandinavian hall-of-fame is that he wants to water the grass way too damn much and waste a lot of our money.

I will defeat my old record of four comments in the Fourum in one day, achieved in March 2002.

Speak like Yoda more people must.

The guy who called about romantic comedies, you are gay.

Why is it when we beat the No. 11 team in the nation, it's not on the front page?

To the biker who said she shouldn't have to look out for the pedestrians: How about you get your stupid bike out onto the road, then you can look for our vehicles to run you over.

Please watch where you throw your glass bottles. My dog can't even go on a walk without getting one of his paws sliced.

To the person who called in about all journalists being bleeding-heart liberals: The word "liberal" means to be open-minded and willing to understand. It is the close-minded people who made it a bad word.

TBS reporter lady — grrrrr.

Hey, Classy Cats, you'd be a little classier if you all weren't picking your wedgies on the sideline during the football game.

One simple request: When K-State scores a touchdown, let's try to send up people who are less than 300 pounds when we crowd surf.

Ell Roberson — if he's not flippin' touchdown passes, he's flippin' switches.

Basketball players are no different than football players, so Pervis, you need to start going to your World Geography class.

Why have one, when you could have six?

To the guy who said, "Nothing makes a girl sexier than seeing her smile": I'll smile for you.

Whoever was farting in the student section on Saturday, that wasn't cool.

Wow, they changed the recording.

Face it. The Collegian dropped the ball entirely on the Hale issue. If you had told us in advance, we might have been able to do something about it.

Drivers from Johnson County are the worst and most dangerous drivers in Manhattan.

The commercial with the Mitsubishi Eclipse is a good anti-drug ad.

I'm tired of the Republican party.

Did anybody see the dad bodysurfing at the game?

I say next year we get a black Willie the Wildcat. We need someone who can dance.

I didn't even care if we lost Saturday's football game, because I knew waiting in my apartment was Shaquille O'Neal's "Kazaam."

Why are all the guys in Putnam rude to the girls?

Did anyone else see Bill Snyder's hot cord-holder at the game? He was hot.

I want to thank all the smart football fans for being so smart. Maybe those stupid fans won't start chanting "over-rated" next time. They damn near jinxed us.

If they keep expanding

Rusty's, they're going to have to change the name from Aggieville to Rustyville.

What in the world is with the new preseason song? You don't need to fix what's not broken.

To the girl who was mooning me outside Durland Hall Friday morning: Were you wearing underwear?

To my roomie with the big red 'fro: Oh, how I love you so. Oh, don't you know, oh, don't you know.

I believe Captain Planet's power was ultimately derived from his Grade-A mullet.

If you want to see what bands and records truly, absolutely, positively suck, just read about them in Rolling Stone, because Rolling Stone is the epitome of everything that is lame.

I think we need to replace Wefald as president of the university. It's his job to lobby on behalf of the students and faculty to secure state funds. He is not doing his job, and as a result, we do not have the money to conduct basic operations, like keeping the library open.

I know where we can find the money to extend the library hours: We have Wefald pay monthly mortgage payments on the fair-market value on that house he lives in for free.

Will bartend for tips.

I hope Roberson isn't coming down with fumble-itis.

Where are all the beautiful women with open minds out there? I guess I'll just stick with my husband.

Personal, intellectual advantages abound in international friendships

Married couple shares benefits of cultural diversity

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Imagine meeting someone from across the ocean, falling in love and getting married.

This isn't a Walt Disney movie. It's the story of Aruna Michie, associate professor of political science, and Barry Michie, assistant professor and director of the study-abroad program.

Aruna grew up in India and went to an American missionary school.

She attended Smith College in Massachusetts on a full scholarship before returning to India and getting involved with the Peace Corps.

Barry was an American who had hopes of serving with the Peace Corps in Turkey, but as fate would have it, he found himself in India under the supervision of Aruna, his Peace Corps trainer.

The couple was married in Aruna's home two years later and returned to the United States together for graduate studies at Michigan State University.

The Michies said there are many advantages to having an international relationship, such as rearing their son in a diverse environment.

Joan Froelich, president of World Friendship, an organization for women from around the world, said learning about different cultures is the biggest advantage of having international relationships.

"In World Friendship, we have the ability to meet ladies of all countries and are able to learn their values and customs while they get to learn ours," Froelich said.

She said it is impossible to understand another country or group of people until you have met members of that society.

"Once you are able to sit on the same level and on a one-on-one basis — we are not fighting, we're learning about each other," she said.

Prior to meeting, both of the Michies had studied abroad — Aruna in the United States and Barry in Greece.

"We both had an international perspective to begin with," Barry said.

The couple said being in a different country helps people both personally and intellectually.

"I don't know how you can live in a world where you don't experience other cultures," Aruna said.

"I was really brought up in a multicultural atmosphere, and I think that it's one of the best things that has happened to me."

Barry agreed that it is important to experience different cultures.

"You get outside your own context and you get challenged," he said.

Monica Pirozi, vice president of the International Coordinating Council at and international student from Brazil, said she agreed it is beneficial to learn about other cultures.

"For me, the most interesting thing about having friends from around the world is you learn about their way of life and learn to respect people," Pirozi said.

Golf team fights back to finish in 5th place

After rocky 1st round, Cats move up standings

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It was a tough battle, but the women's golf team didn't give up.

Coach Kristi Knight said the Wildcats got a slow start in the first round, but a solid second round led to a fifth-place finish.

She said the team deserved a lot of credit.

"Nobody was hitting the ball well, but we got the most out of every round. We sort of escaped," she said. "We dug a hole, but it could have been deeper."

There are always going to be days like that in golf, Knight said. But after posting a 315 first round, the Wildcats fought back with a 302, placing them in a fifth-place tie leading into the final round. "We had a great round two, and that is where we need to be all the time," she said. "But the third round had tough hole locations and cold, wet weather." The conditions made it tough to shoot low scores, Knight said.

Senior Miranda Smith had the lowest overall score, carding a 9-over 225 for three rounds, good for a seventh-place individual finish.

Smith said she hit the ball well, but caught a couple of bad breaks in the first round. She answered with a few birdies in the second round to close with a 1-under 71.

"The third round was nasty, and I just kind of survived. The conditions were bad, and nobody was shooting low scores, but our team did well," she said. "We started off in a three-way tie for third, but we ended up better than we started, finishing fifth all alone."

Knight said Smith and junior Christine Boucher had excellent second rounds, 71 and 73 respectively.

Boucher's second round helped her finish with a 13-over 229, earning her a three-way tie for 11th place.

"We're not jumping up and down," Knight said. "But we finished respectably, and we beat a couple of teams we needed to beat - Nebraska and Michigan."

Nebraska was the only Big 12 competitor at the tournament, so it was good to beat them, she said. Michigan was a national qualifier last year, so that's also a big win.

"Looking at the statistics, we also played within 10 strokes of the host school Michigan State on their home course," Knight said. "We battled early, but we bounced back against some pretty darn good teams."

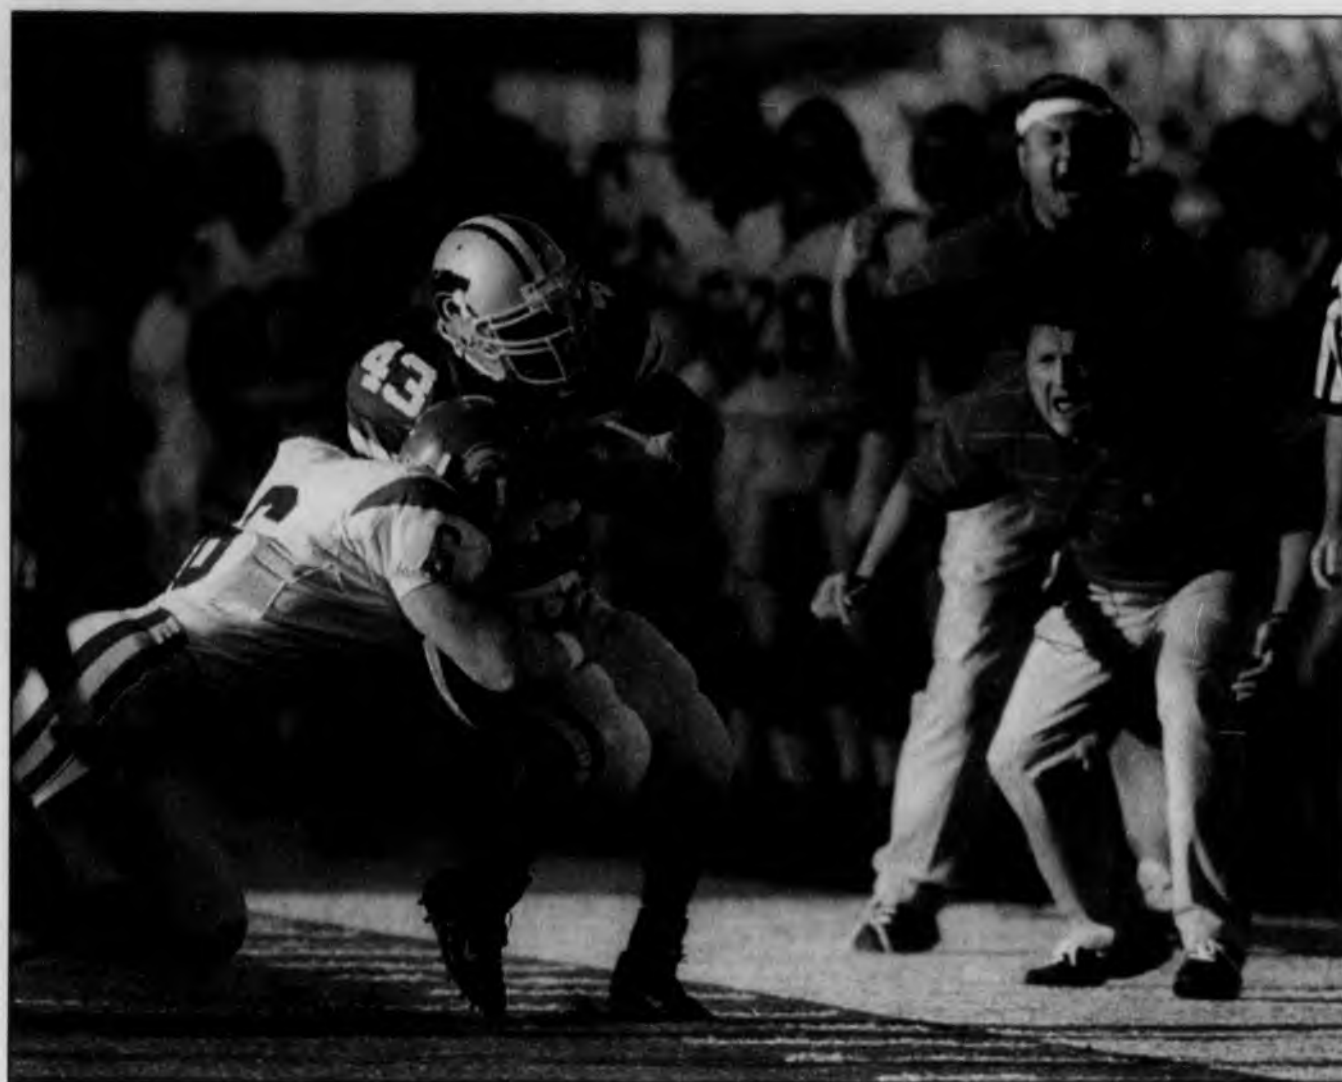

Knight said the Wildcats have started slow in both of their tournaments. That will be something the team will be talking about - how to get all cylinders firing for opening round play, she said.

"We have a couple of weeks before the next tournament, so we'll look at the statistics. Maybe we need a 36-hole practice round," she said. "It's really too early in the year to make it a big thing, but we'll talk about it."

The team has the experience and the talent to play well, Knight said. She said she was proud of how Smith bounced back after a tough outing in Nebraska last weekend.

"All five battled. It wasn't a good tournament because we weren't striking the ball consistently, but we finished well," she said. "We'll go from there."

SPROLES' ROLE

Matt Stamey | COLLEGIAN

While USC assistant coaches yell encouragement, Matt Grootegoed knocks Darren Sproles out of bounds during the first quarter of K-State's 27-20 victory over the Trojans. Sproles has 366 yards of offense this season and is averaging 87 rushing yards per game.

Sophomore running back asset to offense in win over USC

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On K-State's first play from scrimmage in Saturday's 27-20 win over Southern California, Darren Sproles got the ball.

The handoff went for 17 yards.

Then the 170-pound sophomore was relatively quiet in banging out 33 yards in the first half as K-State took a 12-6 lead into the locker room.

At the five minute mark of the third quarter, USC punter Tom Malone gave K-State an excellent scoring chance by punting the ball out at USC's 29-yard line.

After Thomas Hill's 20-yard reception from Ell Roberson put the Wildcats on the 10, Sproles got the ball.

His ensuing 10-yard touchdown scamper gave K-State an opportunity to shut the Trojans down for good.

But that's not how it went. On the first play of the fourth quarter, Roberson's 9-yard touchdown strike to James Terry made it 25-6. Roberson then used the option to score a two-point conversion, and the Wildcats had a lopsided victory within reach.

USC countered by turning the ball over on downs, and after Roberson connected with Derrick Evans for 8 yards, Sproles got the ball again - and gave it away.

Sproles fumbled the ball on the Trojan 35, and USC quarterback Carson Palmer made the Cats pay with a nine-play, 65-yard drive capped by a five-yard touchdown pass to Keary Colbert.

And the Trojans weren't done.

After K-State's next possession yielded a punt, Palmer and company used just three plays, capped by a 25-yard Sultan McCullough touchdown run, to pull within seven.

Facing a possible tie should they give the ball back to USC, K-State took the ball at the 20-yard line and gave it to Sproles. His first touch got the Cats four yards.

Sproles then took a pitch from Roberson and found himself hemmed in by two defenders along K-State's sideline.

Rather than lower his shoulder, Sproles made a move to the inside and immediately spun back across his body toward the sideline. The juke created the room he needed to turn the ball up field for a 19-yard gain, moving the ball out to the K-State 43.

The Wildcats then drove all the way to the Trojan 12 on the strength of a 23-yard jaunt by Daniel Davis and a number of options featuring short gains by Roberson.

But Roberson's option

Jeanel Drake | COLLEGIAN

Quarterback carousel still unpredictable for Roberson, Dunn; Snyder's method has worked for Wildcats through 4 games

The merry-go-round continues for the K-State quarterbacks.

On Saturday, Marc Dunn started and was replaced by Ell Roberson in the K-State lineup after the first quarter.

When asked about the decision, Coach Bill Snyder said "Why not?"

It's awesome when he's candid.

Still, it must be difficult to be Dunn and Roberson when they get put in and yanked out so quickly.

Especially Dunn - he looked tight against USC.

It was like he never got a chance to get rolling during the first quarter. To be fair, the entire offense seemed tight, except for Darren Sproles, who just kept his feet moving and running through holes.

They had a right to be jittery. It is different when you play Division-I, top-15 opponents.

But you didn't see mass substitution. You did see Dunn get yanked and Joe Rheem get the hook after missing a field goal.

To his credit, Roberson entered the game and did a nice job.

Still, he made mistakes - Snyder gave him a C- for his efforts. But K-State won, and Roberson led the offense and is a hero for K-State fans.

He is this week's starter in the fans' eyes, but Snyder hasn't named a starter for the Colorado game.

Against USC, Roberson probably gave K-State a chance to win the game. He did well with the option, and USC didn't defend it very well.

The option offense worked. Snyder out-coached USC's Pete Carroll on Saturday, and K-State won the game.

Fans are happy, Aggieville is hopping, but Dunn and Roberson play under uncertainty.

How resilient are they? Can they just continue getting inserted and pulled out and show any improvement?

These are two competitors who give it everything they have and then some. They are a couple of guys doing the best they can to stay on the field. It's no different than any other people who are attempting to survive the pains and struggles they face in their lives.

It is a difficult situation, and they are learning life lessons about competition in front of 50,000 people.

However, it is time for the coaching staff to make a decision. They have two options: Either cease to name a starter and create a two-player system, or name one starter and go with him the rest of the season.

If Roberson is the man, fine, then go with him. If it is Dunn, fine, but let's stick with one guy. One of these guys needs to be allowed to struggle and then overcome it. That is the only way they are really going to improve.

We heard a lot during the off-season from K-State coaches and media pundits about how the team needed to find the right quarterback. It would be nice to get that issue resolved in time for Colorado.

Either Roberson or Dunn need to be given confidence and the knowledge that it is his job.

The merry-go-round isn't going to work long term. Either Dunn or Roberson needs to be let down and relegated to the bench for the Cats to develop.

You can say it worked Saturday, and it did. But there is a long way to go.

The Cats will not win a championship with rotating quarterbacks.

1-MINUTE DRILL

The Associated Press

NCAA | Pierce among Big 12 players of the week

Colorado running back Chris Brown, Kansas State linebacker Terry Pierce, Texas A&M defensive Ty Warren and Iowa State punt returner Todd Miller received weekly honors from the Big 12 on Monday.

Brown was the offensive player of the week for turning 26 carries into 188 yards and three touchdowns in a 31-17 win at then-No. 20 UCLA. Twelve of his runs produced first downs.

Pierce and Warren shared defensive player of the week.

Pierce had six solo tackles and six assists in a 27-20 victory over Southern California. He also had two tackles for a total loss of nine yards, including a sack.

Warren had 12 total tackles, nine unassisted and three assists, as the Aggies lost 13-3 to Virginia Tech. He also had four tackles for losses of 11 yards, a sack for a loss of three yards, made five third-down stops and blocked a field goal.

NCAA | Ochs out for the season

Craig Ochs, Colorado's starting quarterback, won't play again this season after suffering his third concussion in the past year.

Ochs hasn't played since he was hurt in a game against San Diego State on Sept. 7. Extensive medical tests came back normal but Ochs advised coach Gary Barnett on Monday that his season is over.

Ochs, a junior who has started since his freshman year, will apply for a medical waiver redshirt for this season. He also will withdraw as a student from Colorado and relinquish his athletic scholarship.

In a statement, Ochs said he will re-evaluate his options for returning to play football next season.

NFL | New trial ordered in Raiders lawsuit

Citing jury misconduct, a Los Angeles Superior Court judge on Monday ordered a new trial in the Oakland Raiders' $1.2 billion conspiracy lawsuit against the NFL.

In a 9-3 vote last year, a Superior Court jury rejected the Raiders' claims that the NFL sabotaged the team's plans to build a new stadium in the Los Angeles area and that the team still owned the NFL rights to the Los Angeles market.

The Raiders moved back to Oakland from Los Angeles in 1995.

The allegation comes after jurors in last year's six-week trial said they overheard one member say he hated the Raiders and team owner Al Davis and would never vote in their favor, attorney Larry Feldman said.

MUSIC AND MUNCHIES

Katie Lester | COLLEGIAN

Justin Ostrander, senior in math, and Ian Davidson, 2002 graduate, sing and play guitar Friday night at Gumby's Pizza & Pub. Band members decided to change their name before their performance from "Tumbler" to "The Inking."

Since its recent expansion, Gumby's has become a new venue for local bands to perform.

Gumby's recruits local bands to entertain

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Pizza, a full bar and now live music have transformed Gumby's from just a pizza place into an all-ages music venue.

The restaurant had been planning to invite musicians since starting its recent remodeling, Shawn Leeth, Gumby's bar manager, said. The plan is to have bands play every Tuesday and some Fridays in the expansion area.

"It rounds out what we've got," Leeth said. "There's food, a full bar and now a variety of entertainment. The room is a good set up for this type of thing."

Warding off belligerent requests for AC/DC and Lynyrd Skynyrd, Scott Anderson, senior in anthropology, played in the intimate venue Friday. Accompanied only by his acoustic guitar, Anderson said sometimes you just have to deal with loud drunk people while performing.

"There are a couple of ways to deal with that, and the worst is to ignore them," he said.

"If you don't pay attention to them, it just seems to make them try harder. If you can play what they want to hear, it's nice to fit in because they usually shut up after that."

Ian Davidson, singer for the Inking and 2002 K-State graduate, had a different way of dealing with the situation. After multiple requests for some Skynyrd, the singer thought of a quick solution to push one of his own songs, "Purely Circumstance."

"This is actually a little-known track on a Skynyrd import that only the biggest Lynyrd Skynyrd fan would know, and chances are, sir, that you are that man," he said.

Leeth said he wanted to create a listening environment for all ages that is intimate. The venue is a double-edged sword for bands, though.

"It's all ages and there's no cover, so bands pick up a lot of people that wouldn't normally come in for a show," Leeth said.

"But they don't make much money. They get better exposure sometimes because people will just stop in and listen without paying for 10 minutes, but they wouldn't if there were a cover."

Leeth said that with more venues supporting live music, the town is becoming friendlier to artists. Students in Lawrence often take for granted the variety of music in the area, and Leeth said he would like to see that

Live music at Gumby's

- Lucas will play at 9 tonight.
- Bluestem will play at 9 p.m. on Oct. 1.

Shows at Gumby's are free and all ages are welcome.

kind of support for Manhattan music. He said he is excited to help open another establishment to bands.

Leeth said he previously worked at Rusty's Last Chance and Tula's Out of Bounds, where he booked bands for two years.

Davidson said Leeth is a key supporter of local live music.

"Shawn's relationship with the bands is a good one," he said. "He probably has the best rapport in town with musicians. Out of all the folks in town, he takes a personal interest in the bands rather than just a financial interest."

Davidson's band, the Inking, played an acoustic set while pushing his solo album.

The band will play next on Oct. 10 at Pat's Blue Rib'n Barbecue.

The environment gave the band a chance to experiment with acoustics and effects since the Inking is usually more electric, he said.

"The big thing that's appealing about Gumby's is the intimacy," he said. "The people are right there, and you can see them react to the music."

Anderson, who previously attended the University of Missouri and played guitar in a band called Folkshop, said it reminded him of a similar situation in Columbia, Mo.

"Shakespeare's Pizza in Columbia became successful with live music, and it was just a little pizza place where bands could play, a lot like this," he said.

Anderson has a repertoire ranging from Dave Matthews Band to Lynyrd Skynyrd, but he concentrates more on his original music.

He throws in covers to get the audience's attention, he said.

He is now working on an album with Aaron Weisbender, who joined him in the band Gobofiddlers when he attended Manhattan High School.

Anderson has developed a small following at O'Malley's on Wednesday open-mic night, and is looking for a band, but since he just came back from Missouri over the summer, it has been difficult, he said.

"I'm trying to get back into the music scene around here, because I don't know anyone anymore," he said. "Shawn's kind of been helping me with that."

Lucas to bring mostly covers, some originals to pizza place

Lucas Bingham, senior in mechanical engineering, will perform at 9 tonight at Gumby's Pizza.

Bingham, performing as Lucas is half of the musical duo, Lucas & Barlow now defunct since the other half graduated in May, talked briefly about tonight's set.

Q: What can people expect of the performance at Gumby's?

A: I'll be doing solo acoustic stuff, and for a little while I'll have Joe Brand, (senior in advertising) backing me up on rhythm guitar while I play electric. I'm influenced by Ben Harper, and lately the Grateful Dead and Bob Marley. I do a combination of acoustic songs with some electric jams.

Q: How did you get started playing in Manhattan?

A: I've been performing for three years now. I started when I met Barlow up here. We played open-mic nights, and got some songs together and started gigging. I'm just continuing what we were doing.

Q: What can people expect from your set?

A: I want everyone to have a good time and enjoy the music. I play mostly covers with some originals. I'll cover Jack Johnson, the Grateful Dead, Ben Harper, Dave Matthews and stuff like that. I love music, and I like performing in front of people.

POLL | Reinstated poll would help Legislature with political decisions

households to determine political opinions.

The last time the poll was conducted, in 1997, some members of the Kansas Legislature voiced strong criticism for the poll, Leonard Bloomquist said.

Bloomquist, professor in sociology, also said the poll's reinstatement was set back last spring when Robert Poresky, professor in family studies and one of the founders of the poll, died of cancer.

Another reason the poll was ended was because of financial troubles.

"We could not obtain a steady source of funding," Bloomquist said.

But with the government playing such a big role in the lives of Kansans, Murray and Bloomquist both said they feel it is time to revive the poll.

"The poll was designed to assess Kansans' outlook on the future," Murray said.

The poll traditionally has been conducted over the telephone with randomly selected numbers from all over Kansas.

"We always got a good response," Murray said. "People were willing to talk to us when they heard who we were."

Bloomquist said the poll asked general demographic questions along with political opinion questions, and the poll helped the Legislature with political decisions.

"We asked if Kansans would support tax cuts," he said.

The poll stipulated that if taxes were cut, it would mean that certain services performed by the government would be lost.

Bloomquist said they found that people were not in favor of tax cuts at that time.

"It served a very useful purpose in providing information about how adults in Kansas felt about issues," he said.

Murray agreed the poll helped Kansas lawmakers in the past, and he said he believed it will be able to help again.

"It helps the governor and Legislature because it gives them non-biased and non-partisan views about what Kansans think," Murray said.

Murray is now trying to ensure that the poll is as scientific as possible. Special committees will be set up to decide which questions to ask and how to ask them.

In the past, Murray said, they found a sort of unity across Kansas with the poll.

"In general, there were not large differences between what rural families thought were important and what urban families thought were important," he said.

However, there are many questions that need to be addressed before the poll can become active again.

"We have to think about finance, and of course we have to think about if people will support the poll," Murray said. "Lastly, we have to consider who is going to be involved in running the poll."

Even though these details remain uncertain, Murray is positive the poll has a future in Kansas.

"We are hopeful that we will be able to provide some input for the Legislature," he said.

ships also had to complete a Costa Rican study abroad program such as a study tour, semester abroad or year abroad. Other requirements included a 3.5 high school grade point average and a 3.0 GPA at K-State.

Joe Montgomery, communications writer at the Foundation, said the scholarship is not tied to any specific curriculum or college.

Brazle, Walker and five other K-State students went to Costa Rica last spring for two weeks to study tropical livestock and crops.

The trip was made possible through a College of Agriculture Costa Rican tour sponsored by the Office of International Programs.

Brazle said she learned many different things about agricultural life in Costa Rica.

"Their methods are different because of the different weather," she said.

"I focused more on the livestock aspect, like how they cross-breed cattle to adapt to the weather."

Brazle said there also were other perks to her trip.

"I learned how to salsa, and it was really great to practice my minor, Spanish," she said.

Brazle said she was glad she took the opportunity to go to Costa Rica.

"The people are friendly and it was great to experience how they see things," she said. "And I never knew that pineapples grew out of the ground."

IS GOD CALLING YOU AND GETTING A BUSY SIGNAL?

do you feel a longing for more in your life?

do you long to follow in the footsteps of Jesus?

In today's world, it's so easy to lose sight of why we're really here. So perhaps the thought of devoting your entire life to God has never crossed your mind.

Then again maybe it has. Maybe you're one of the rare women who are being called by God to follow in the footsteps of Jesus. And if you'd only take a moment to really listen to your inner voice. God will get through.

We are the Sisters of St. Joseph, an international order with roots right here in Wichita. And we invite you to come live a life of holiness, in a community where we strive for unity and reconciliation among all people with God and with one another. Ours is a community of prayer and service. Our dedication to God motivates us and is the source of joy for all that we do.

But how can you know if you truly have been called? Do you feel a longing for more in your life? Do you feel a void in your heart? Do you radiate joy? Does love pour out of your smile and do you long to follow Jesus?

If so, you owe it to yourself to answer God's call. To learn more about The Sisters of St. Joseph, call or visit us online. You'll be eternally grateful you did.

U.S. presents draft resolution on Mideast crisis

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — Calling a Palestinian draft resolution one-sided, the United States countered Monday with its own proposal to condemn Palestinian suicide bombings and call on Israel to cease military actions around Yasser Arafat's compound.

U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte said he wouldn't support a resolution that "fails to recognize that this conflict has two sides, that fails to condemn acts of terror and the groups that perpetrate them."

Israel is opposed to any new Security Council resolution on its conflict with the Palestinians, regardless of the wording.

"Any resolution here will be perceived as rewarding terrorism," deputy Israeli ambassador Aaron Jacob said.

The Palestinian draft resolution blames Israel for the upsurge in violence, demands its withdrawal from Palestinian cities and expresses concern for the humanitarian plight of the Palestinian people.

It doesn't address Israel's security concerns or mention Palestinian suicide bombings, including the two that occurred last week that prompted Israeli troops to surround Arafat's West Bank headquarters and demolish buildings inside the compound.

"Israel's recent actions ... are not helpful, either in achieving a lasting end to violence or promoting vital reforms," Negroponte told the Security Council.

Negroponte's spokesman, Richard Grenell, said the Palestinian resolution was "too one-sided and does not lay out U.S. criteria for a balanced resolution."

A U.S. diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the United States — Israel's closest ally — had considered using its powerful veto to block the Palestinian draft if it would have come to a vote Monday.

World leaders demand U.N. support for war

By Constant Brand
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

COPENHAGEN, Denmark — The European Union and 10 Asian nations on Monday called for U.N. backing for any action against Iraq while underscoring that any U.S. strike must comply with international law.

In a declaration, the 25 leaders said terrorism posed a "serious threat" to world peace and security, but added that the fight against terrorism "must be based on the principles of the U.N. Charter and basic norms of international law."

The text appeared to address the standoff over Iraq, but didn't specify any country by name.

While an earlier summit draft said that any action should not violate humanitarian law and human rights, the two were absent from the final declaration.

Leaders from 15 EU nations, as well as Japan, China, South Korea and seven members of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations discussed economic issues and terror at the two-day summit.

Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen — whose country currently holds the rotating EU presidency — told reporters that the discussion on Iraq resulted in a call by all leaders for a "multilateral approach" to resolve the standoff.

Fogh Rasmussen admitted that participants disagreed on whether military action should be taken against Iraq, adding that many leaders felt the Middle East crisis "complicates the international community's efforts on Iraq."

While some European countries have come around to the idea of a U.S.-led strike, many Asian countries fear it could allow violations of national sovereignty.

Washington has warned it could take unilateral military action against Iraq if the U.N. Security Council cannot produce a new resolution giving Iraq a short deadline to comply with U.N. demands on allowing in weapons inspectors.

SPROLES | Sophomore earns high marks against USC

attempt from the 12 was stopped at the five. The ball then came loose, but was ruled a fumble by the referees.

USC recovered in the end-zone and got one more chance, but was sent packing for what was probably a very long plane ride back to California by the K-State defense.

One can only guess that, had K-State been given the opportunity to get the ball in from the five, they might have very well given the ball to Sproles.

Coach Bill Snyder, pleased to get his first win over a ranked non-conference opponent, said much the same after the Trojans were sent on their way.

"He lost the ball on the turnover but I thought he played with so much heart today," Snyder said.

"There are a lot of guys I thought did a really nice job today, that played beyond themselves. And Darren was one of those guys."

Snyder said Sproles was essential to the limited production of the offense in the first half.

"Whatever he had in the first half he made it all on his own," he said, "because he never got beyond the line of scrimmage without getting hit. We'll make some highlight clips out of some things he did."

Snyder said that while Sproles was good in the early and middle parts of the game, his running back's true assets shone through when the contest was on the line.

"Late in the ballgame when we ran a couple of little things and he's out in the open and making guys miss him, that's because we don't block anybody. He was good," he said.

Offensive Coordinator Ron Hudson said Sproles gave the coaches — and USC — a number of things they hadn't anticipated Saturday.

"He's special," Hudson said. "He did some things that were very unique. We got him the ball a lot and that's what we're going to do, day in and day out."

Ultimately, Sproles had rushed for 78 yards, a total quarterback Eli Roberson said didn't measure accurately.

"I tell you all the time," Roberson said. "One-on-one, I'm going to put my money on him, cause he's going to make it happen."

"He showed everybody that just one person isn't enough to take him down. He should be the MVP of this game."

SCALPING

Students earn extra money by selling tickets

rules avoid problems that fans might encounter while buying tickets from scalpers.

"One of the major issues to avoid is the problem with people getting ripped off," he said. "We have had anything from people selling students tickets to our non-students and selling counterfeit tickets in big popular games."

Moreover, as the season continues and other popular sports such as women's basketball begin, campus police are strictly enforcing all policies to avoid any future problems.

"This past game we were much more forceful with them and moving away from our property and away from our ticket sales area," Scott said. "We will continue to try to enforce this, since it is an area that Tim Weiser has continued to have concern about and has asked us to do our best to enforce our policies."

"Our intent will be to continue just as we've been doing this past week. I don't think we're naive enough to stop this totally, but we are going to make the effort," he said.

Although campus police are becoming more and more stringent with the policy enforcement, ticket sellers like Jensen and many others will continue to sell the tickets.

"I don't have time for a full-time job, so I choose to do this instead," he said.

"It's not illegal to sell them off of school property, so I'll keep doing it."

ACCIDENT

Student injured while waterskiing

Nick Heckerson, team member and senior in hotel and restaurant management, said the hospital is running tests, but it is unknown how long Ervin will have to stay at the hospital.

"It was just a freak accident," he said.

Heckerson said the Waterski Team takes every safety precaution possible. Everyone wears jumpsuits, knee braces and helmets. Backboards also were on the boat.

But, he said, there are always risks to the sport.

Although Heckerson said team members can sometimes fall wrong and break a body part, this accident was a shock.

"I have never seen anything like this," he said. "It was just so unexpected."

WEBMAIL

Users asked to self-monitor size of e-mail accounts

Townsend said CNS temporarily solved the problem by moving larger mailboxes to a different location, which freed up more e-mail disk space.

According to www.ksu.edu/cns, these large accounts consumed 46 percent of the total e-mail disk space, and only 3 percent of users had these accounts.

After they were moved, access returned to normal. However, Townsend said, a long-term solution is needed.

"Historically, people would prefer they are not limited in their e-mail, but as we saw last week, that's not a sustainable model," he said.

As of Monday morning, 18 mailboxes already had grown to more than 20 megabytes.

He said it is clear that e-mail usage will continue to grow, so the solution falls to administration and students. He said administration needs to continue to invest more money in the e-mail system, and students need to self-regulate their account sizes.

"Especially in this tight budget climate, we can't just keep throwing more money into the problem," he said.

He said CNS is in the process of acquiring a large storage area network that would provide more disk space.

"But again, all of this costs money, and it is not unlimited, so we need people to continue to keep their mailboxes cleaned up," Townsend said.

As another short-term measure, CNS is proposing to check the size of accounts each night and requesting those with larger mailboxes to decrease the size. If they do not comply, then their mailboxes would be moved to another location, just as they were last week.

Townsend said he hopes to have the system in place by October, but it must be presented to several committees and approved by central administration first.

He said he knows last week's access problems were frustrating, but that regulating inbox sizes will help curtail any future problems. He also said he had not heard of any cases where critical information was lost or delayed.

James Sherow, associate professor of history, said any time Webmail is not working correctly, it concerns professors because many dispense information to their classes

Sherow said one of his classes is required to partake in discussions through an e-mail Listserv. Luckily, he said, the Listserv had not been completely established yet. However, it still affected departmental work because he could not communicate with colleagues.

"It's just a nuisance when it goes down because we've been informed that it's nice to use this technology in our classrooms, and when you employ it, and then it doesn't work - it just frustrates students, and it frustrates professors, and then no one wants to use it," Sherow said.

Townsend said the bottom line is that people need to keep their inboxes clean in order to ensure access.

"If everyone did that, we'd have no problem," he said.

Waterski victim's condition upgraded

Outlook positive after student's larynx surgery

By Shannon Hartenstein
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A student injured in a waterski accident during the weekend is in fair condition.

Jessica Ervin, junior in mass communications, underwent larynx surgery at St. Louis University Hospital after suffering neck injuries during a jump at a waterski competition in Illinois. During the maneuver, her neck was caught in the tow-rope and tow-rope handle.

"She is in fair condition," a hospital spokeswoman said. "Her vital signs are stable. She may be experiencing some discomfort, but the outcome looks good."

Ervin has been a member of the K-State Waterski Team for three years. She was competing at the Great Plains Conference Championship in DuQuoin, Ill., near Southern Illinois University when the accident occurred.

The accident was unusual since most waterski injuries are limited to broken bones, said Nick Heckerson, team member and senior in hotel and restaurant management. The Waterski Team takes all possible safety precautions to avoid injuries but can't eliminate all risks, he said.

The hospital did not release information concerning when Ervin will be released.

Ft. Riley cemetery almost full

Military grave site has 7 spots left; more plots to come

By Scot Gammill
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Fort Riley cemetery was constructed in 1853. Now, 149 years later, the cemetery is almost out of burial plots.

"We currently have seven spots left," Christie Vanover, deputy media relations officer, said. "We are in the process of trying to make a few additional grave spots."

The 70-acre cemetery, located on the southwest perimeter of the base on Hubener Road, has 4,000 grave sites, but officials aren't sure how many people have been buried there.

"In 1855 and 1867, there was a cholera epidemic, and we buried all those who died during that time along a side wall of the cemetery," Vanover said. "We had wooden tombs up for everyone who died during the epidemic, but there was a fire, and they all burned down, so we aren't sure how many bodies are actually in the cemetery."

Also, in 1999, a road was destroyed to make room for a 75-plot cemetery expansion.

"We are about to remove another road and add another 32 spots," Vanover said. "We only have seven spots left, plus the 32 that will be made soon."

The cemetery is averaging about seven burials a month, Vanover said, so officials

Search for dean extended

Committee hopes to fill vacancy by spring 2004

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The search to find a permanent dean of the College of Arts and Sciences has been extended by six months.

Provost James Coffman said the search committee will begin screening candidates during the spring 2003 semester and will interview applicants in fall 2003. He said he anticipated a permanent appointment anytime from January to June 2004.

Stephen White serves as the college's interim dean.

The previous time frame included screening candidates this fall and interviewing them in January, Coffman said. With the old plan, K-State would have hired a permanent dean in spring 2003.

"The old timeline would have put us a little bit ahead of the recruiting curve," Coffman said. "With the new plan, we will have a better chance of finding the best applicants during the recruiting cycle."

James Hamilton, search committee chairman and associate professor of philosophy, said the new timeline is a good compromise because it reflects concerns the committee raised.

"We had a certain amount of momentum with the search," Hamilton said. "We still maintain that momentum even though we're essentially delaying acting on the search for six months." Coffman said extending and restructuring the search will also allow the new dean to have a better financial picture for the next two to three years.

Hamilton said the financial future of the state and university still is uncertain, and while the interim dean can make a few long-range decisions, it's better to have the permanent dean in place for the sake of long-term planning.

"Finding a permanent dean is critical," he said. "It's better to have a permanent dean knowing that he or she will be in that position for five or six years."

Hundreds of students attend All-University Career Fair

Potential employers meet KSU job-seekers; students take aim at competitive market

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kelly Kasmarick intends to find a job.

She knew that attending the All-University Career Fair on Tuesday would be a starting point — so she did.

And she enjoyed it. "There are a lot of companies here," Kasmarick, senior in management, said. "Where else are you going to find that?"

The two-day event in Bramlage Coliseum, sponsored by Career and Employment Services, began at noon Tuesday and will continue today from noon to 5 p.m. Employers from around Kansas and surrounding states with names beginning L-Z attended Tuesday, and employers A-K will be available today.

Marcia Schuley, associate director of CES, said the Career Fair has been an all-university event for the past nine years but has been a two-day event for only the past three years. She said 249 employers registered to attend the Career Fair this year, a figure that is down from 304 employers last year.

Schuley said she thinks the decline in participants is due to the poor state of the economy, but she still is hopeful about this year's

Mike Starbuck, director of Human Resources at Reinke Manufacturing Company Inc., tells Spilharish Pispatti, graduate student in electrical engineering, about his company. Pispatti attended the fair looking for jobs and possible internships.

"We feel this is an extremely respectable amount of employers in this tight economy," she said.

Schuley said most students are not discouraged by the tight job market. At 3:30 p.m. Tuesday, about 2,500 students had walked through the turnstiles at Bramlage.

Betsy Love, senior in accounting and finance, was one K-State student who attended the Career Fair in order to network and submit her résumé.

She said she attended the Career Fair last year and gained an internship from the experience, so she was ready to try again — this time for a full-time job.

"I'm ready for a second wind," Love said. "It's a lot easier this year, because I have an offer, so I am just basically trying to get a feel for it."

Love said she thinks the Career Fair experience is the most valuable for students who want to see the many faces of the companies.

"You get to talk to people who are out of college and into the working field," she said. "It's a really good place to learn about the company and the personality of the company."

Bruce Oberle, an associate in the tax department at PricewaterhouseCoopers, said the Career Fair helps students get pointed in the right direction for their future. He said his company booth was packed with students inquiring about opportunities throughout the afternoon.

"A lot of people want to know what kind of opportunities they can have within the firm," he said. "We are mainly here to answer questions and help students find out the things that are hard to know."

BANTER AND BELLOW | Cheap night out

Trips to restaurants, drinking establishments would take care of mysterious $20 present

Burgers, bomber and possibly a lady

First I'd go to Kream Cup and get three cheeseburgers, a taco burger, fries, onion rings, a large Coke, a large strawberry shake and a chocolate-mint ice cream cone. That would leave me with about $17.50. I'm hardly kidding.

Maybe if I had a sweet-thang lady friend along, she could have the same. That brings me down to $15. If she smiled, laughed at my jokes and didn't get mad if I corrected her grammar, it would be totally worth it.

Then we would go for a round of pool in the K-State Student Union. It's something like a buck fifty or so for a round, which leaves me with $13.50.

I can entirely forget about taking my smoking-hot honeysuckle on a trip to the movies. You're talking about nearly $20 for that whole ordeal on its own. Really, you just can't go around being that swanky every day.

Instead, since I'm still thinking cheap, I'll lay down $6.99 for a six-pack of Red Stripe, leaving me with $6.50.

But if I forget about taking the girl out, I could scratch pool and put what I spent on her toward some serious fun. I would have $10.50, which would probably be a poo-load more fun.

It being a Wednesday and all, I'd scooch on down to open mic night at O'Malley's and hear the perpetually graceful "Foxy Francie" sing Jewel and various country songs.

She also waitresses and dances on tables.

And I still have nearly 11 Washingtons to spare. All I need is a Belfast Bomber and uninterrupted, supreme control of the jukebox.

After devoting all my quarters to 311 and Pearl Jam, I would be flat-aaaaaally broke. Dana would probably find me and use what was left of her mysterious $20 to buy me a Guinness.

She probably would. She owes me big-time.

No meat, probably no man

I'm blessed with red hair, but I'm not so sure I have the luck of the Irish. Let's all just hope I am fortunate enough to find a $20 bill.

Let's also hope that the "or else" on the note with the bill is not a threat on my life. I have tons of things left to do, like tour the world or maybe just learn to cook.

Since I don't really cook, the first thing I would think of is food. I am a closet Sonic fan, so I'd head over there and get a Texas Toaster grilled cheese — the perfect comfort food, even when you're already comfortable. A nice chocolate malt would go along with that. That would still leave me about $17.

Let's fantasize and imagine I have a studmuffin of my own. Would I take him along? Probably not. He'd no doubt eat seven bucks worth of beef patties. I'll meet up with him later.

Then I'd buy something tangible, maybe the latest copy of "Maxim" magazine, if none of my male pals has one handy. It's about five bucks, but worth every penny. It's more enlightening than women's magazines' obsession with make-up and clothing.

I still have $12. That, my friends, would all go for the bars.

I don't have a favorite yet. I've only been legal — to drink, boys — for a week. So I would take my dough and take a tour of the bars, including the ones I've already visited — for comparison.

Of course, I wouldn't want to go alone. I'd take Studmuffin, if he existed. If not, I guess I'd spring for Layton, but I'd rather he drink something I would want to sip on, like a nice, light beer.

Yet, I don't owe him — or anyone else — a thing.

Book explaining cancer to children grows in popularity, recently published in Spanish

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Nearly every day, a different child joins Dr. Waddle in his superduper research laboratory to learn about cancer.

"The idea has really taken off," said Jan Galitzer, administrative assistant for the Center for Basic Cancer Research. "The book is now used all over the country and even throughout the world."

Since "A Day With Dr. Waddle" was created in 1988, the popularity of the book has grown more than the originators could ever have imagined.

The coloring book was created to educate children about the different aspects of cancer. It informs them about cancer cells, science and good health by using a cartoon duck named Dr. Waddle.

The idea originated when a Manhattan teacher approached the center about available resources that would help her explain cancer to young children. The teacher had two children in her second-grade class who had family members with cancer, and many of the other students seemed interested in the subject, Galitzer said.

"We looked everywhere," she said. "There was lots of information for kids with cancer, but nothing about family members or friends having cancer. So, a couple of staff members took it upon themselves to write and illustrate a book that catered to the need."

The center then published a rough version and distributed it to the teacher to use with her class.

"The response was overwhelming," Galitzer said. "Soon, all second-grade teachers in Manhattan were using it. So in a year or so, the center went back and published the first edition. Now, it has grown from there."

It's grown so much that the book was translated into Spanish about two years ago.

"There was a need for it," said Laurine Speights, marketing and program director for the center, "and there has been an overwhelming response for it, both nationally and internationally."

Because the center received funding for the Spanish version of the book, it was able to distribute copies of Dr. Waddle for free to several organizations.

"We got it into the right hands, and from that we have received new orders," Galitzer said.

The book costs $2 for orders of 10 or fewer and $1.50 for orders of 11 or more books. The center makes no money from the sale. All money goes toward printing costs.

"We want to help people explain what cancer is to children and deal with the issue, not make money," Galitzer said. "That might be one of the reasons Dr. Waddle gets such a positive response wherever he goes."

For the past year, Dr. Waddle has been helping patients at the Surgical Associates in Manhattan.

"It has been very helpful,"

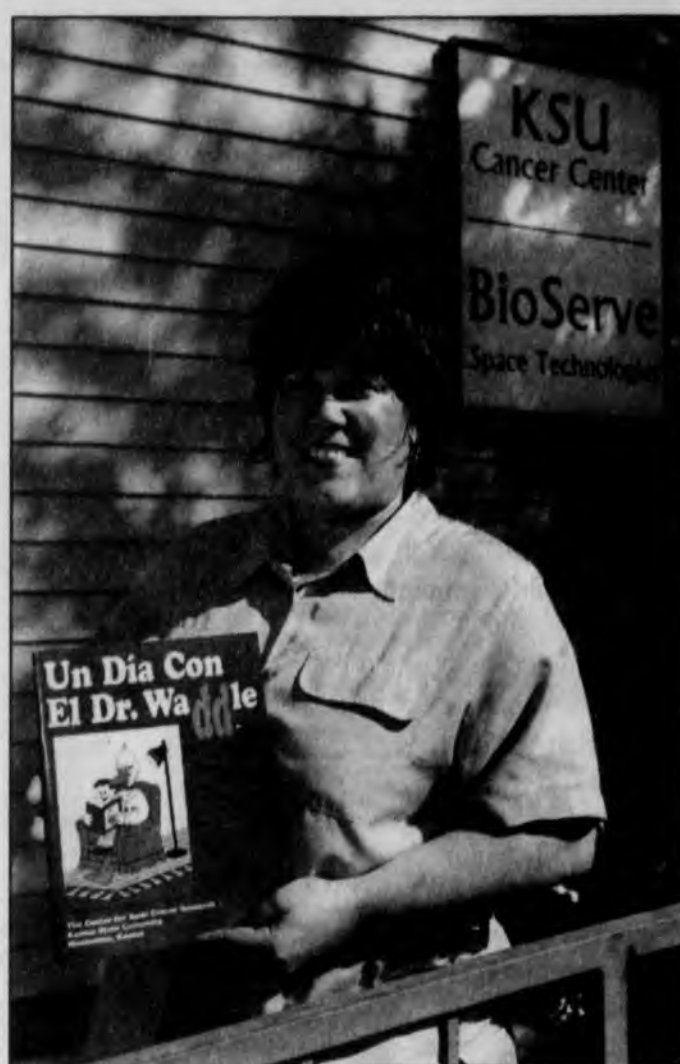

Janet Kiser, registered nurse, said. "The patients appreciate the book because it helps all children of all ages - from young to teenage years - understand the disease."

Kiser, a breast cancer survivor, first learned about the book when her cancer support group toured the center.

"Being a nurse and seeing a lot of cancer patients, I knew this would be helpful to people with children," she said. "A lot of children don't understand what the disease is when they hear the word cancer. This book has such simple language, and it brings it down to their level."

The book explains at a second-grade level what cancer is through a friendly duck who happens to be a scientist. It helps alleviate the fears and misconceptions associated with the disease, Galitzer said.

"The problem we find is, when someone close to a child gets sick, a lot of times the sickness isn't explained," she said. "This helps make it possible for adults to talk to children about the tough subject. It really is a pretty neat book."

TO THE POINT Banning books only hinders quality education

People should not be quick to judge literature, especially if they know nothing about its content.

We should all challenge what we believe. We should seek out different writings that defy society's norms and educate ourselves to help sort through our accepted preconceptions.

When certain types of literature are banned, we can't understand the big picture.

It is educators' jobs to make sure students are exposed to a variety of material. By limiting students' exposure, educators are not letting those students form their own opinions.

Books like "Harry Potter" are being banned because the magic could be interpreted as non-Christian. But books like these have children putting down the X-Box controllers and reading.

Parents should be encouraging these behaviors, not accepting policies that limit children's access to knowledge.

Parents shouldn't be so quick to jump on the bandwagon. If they haven't read questionable material, they shouldn't say, "I've heard about that book. My children aren't going to read that."

They should take the initiative to understand the content and help their children understand controversial issues.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

BOOGER-FREE, PLEASE Restaurants lax on germ-awareness, cleanliness

Food safety is a big concern of mine. I'm not talking about bioterrorism or agroterrorism - I'm talking about the restaurant cleanliness.

And, in light of the fact that September is National Food Safety Month, I want to let you all in on some of the requirements restaurants have to meet to stay operational.

To receive those green certificates with the passing "A" during inspection, restaurants have to meet a series of criteria regarding food storage, building codes and employee hygiene. My sister-in-law, a senior field consultant for Dairy Queen, Inc., oversees more than 100 stores in a multi-state region and inspects those stores twice a year to make sure they're up to code.

She said for foods to be safe, they have to be stored at the proper temperatures - above 140 degrees Fahrenheit for hot food, below 40 degrees for cold food - and employees in Kansas are required to wear plastic gloves when handling any ready-to-eat food, such as sandwich condiments and cooked meat. This is to avoid diseases such as Hepatitis A.

Also, one of the main reasons people get sick is because hot foods are improperly cooled when stored at night. They don't reach the 40-degree temperature mark before being reheated, and bacteria begin to form.

My sister-in-law also said chemicals cannot be stored near food or paper products, and they have to be properly labeled. Also, doors and windows must remain closed to prevent insect and rodent infestations.

For some eating establishments, having this kind of clean working environment is a top priority. At others, managers have a tendency to get lackadaisical when it comes to the upkeep of the store and its employees' hygiene.

Such is the case at one of the fast-food joints here in Manhattan.

One afternoon, my husband and I entered the anonymous sandwich shack and got in line behind another couple. As we were waiting to place our order, we noticed the woman working our register of choice blow her nose several times and not wash her hands before touching people's food.

I don't know about you, but I don't want to eat other people's boogers. I don't even eat my own boogers. It's just revolting.

My husband and I never once saw the woman retreat to the back of the store to wash her hands. She just kept using the same tissue to wipe her snot while handling food at the same time.

She also had long, stringy hair lazily swept up in a ponytail. We almost barfed at the thought of discovering one of those strands in our sandwiches.

Then, the woman in question went over to arrange desserts under a warmer. She got some icing on her fingers, proceeded to lick the icing right off and then continued to touch the pastries.

Needless to say, my husband and I switched lines. We should've just left.

Even the appearance of the drink station and dining area were awful, though I can stand filthy tables and floors more than I can stand other people's mucus.

We seriously debated writing this establishment a letter declaring our abhorrence, but for some reason, we procrastinated too long and soon lost interest.

This restaurant was one of my favorites. I used to eat there all the time, but my appetite for fries has somewhat subsided.

It just sickens me to know restaurants like the aforementioned are getting away with this kind of negligence. It should be the No. 1 priority of eating establishments to keep the restaurant clean and its employees from spreading germs all over the food.

I urge you to make sure the places where you eat are meeting sanitation and health codes.

I also urge all of the area restaurant managers to put themselves in the customers' shoes, especially during National Food Safety Month.

Unless, of course, you are among the select few who enjoy eating boogers.

Note to self: be sure insults are actually insulting opponent

We have lost the ability to frame elegant insults.

At least, that's the impression I got while sorting through my mounds of hate e-mail last week.

People seem to get stupider every day. Earlier this semester, I was getting e-mail comments like, "Hi yuor column doesent make sense OK>?" That was fine. I could understand it, at any rate.

Since then, the insults seem to have gotten progressively dumber, culminating in this week's storm of idiocy. The stupid flame-mail I've received in the last few days has driven me past the edge of complacency - I'm just sick of it.

For example, one person called me both a Nazi and a communist - in the same paragraph. Others referred to me variously as an "American-hatign fagot" and a "Mohamaden conspirator against our Democracy."

What happened to the good old days when people could frame biting, ironic barbs of wit? Barely 50 years ago, people like Winston Churchill were coming up with outstanding put-downs. Once, a woman allegedly told him that if she were his wife, she would poison his coffee. He reportedly answered, "Madam, if I were your husband, I would drink it!"

How did we slip so far in such a short time?

Because of this decline, I would like to offer my would-be detractors a few nuggets of wisdom. Perhaps my advice will help them to mock me in cleverer and more original ways in the future.

1. Do not make fun of a political ideology if you do not understand it.

Communists are not the same as fascists.

Fascists, like Adolf Hitler's Nazis and Benito Mussolini's Fascisti, believe their own nations are better than everybody else's. They often support war and try to annex other people's land. They were the bad guys in World War II - the war Grandpappy, not Pa, fought in.

Communists are on the other end of the political spectrum. They believe people should be nice to each other and share stuff. They also believe the world's poor people will someday rise up to take control of the government and make everybody share their stuff.

They were the bad guys in Vietnam - the war Pa fought in.

If you want to insult a communist, you should say things like, "Why hasn't your proletariat arisen yet, sillyhead?" and "Your philosophy fails to take human avarice into account!"

If you want to insult a fascist, you should try something more along the lines of, "You think you're No. 1? Well, you're No. 3, my fine friend

... after France and Canada!"

2. Don't misspell your insults.

Nothing says "I am a fat-hat" like misspelled words. Spellcheck isn't hard to use, so use it. Don't display your ignorance if you can avoid it.

3. No, I did not write my column without researching it.

Seeing as I did not limit my research to five minutes of looking at Britney Spears pictures from Yahoo! News, I might just know more about the topic than you do.

4. Be original.

Don't use old cliches like "LOL! Your a fagot yuo suk hahaha." Those are boring and annoying. Instead, poke fun at your opponent's personal appearance. How about something like "Your pitiful, rapidly-vanishing hair looks like a monster that is trying to eat your brains and starving in the process?"

With a little bit of planning and proofreading, you'll soon be able to transcend your natural tendency to send me really dumb insults via e-mail.

Please, for the sake of my mental health, no more stupidity.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

I am calling in regards to the roommate who chews his own toenails. Where has that guy been? It's much easier to cut them off and then chew on them.

I don't think Mimi Bobeck is hot. Blanche from the "Golden Girls" is much more attractive.

If Batman were to poop, would it be guano?

Willie, black? Have you ever seen Vanilla Ice?

It's not that Johnson County people don't know how to drive, it's that everybody else in this town doesn't know how to drive, and they're the only ones who do. I'm not even from Johnson County.

Dunn and Roberson are done. It really doesn't matter. Either way, they both have to play like they want to be there - for the team.

My roommates and I steal our cable. Does that mean we have hot Cox?

Yesterday my girlfriend asked me why we only have sex twice a day.

To all the people at my house last Saturday who decided they had to have beer and drink that last half of a keg in my garage: I just wanted you all to know that was leftover from homecoming last year.

As a student of K-State and a loyal tax payer to the state of Kansas, I'm asking you to please quit wasting my taxpayer's money by printing things in languages which are not needed in this country.

Tú viven en los Estados Unidos, tú hablan inglés.

I hear the people in Putnam 124 are getting free cable.

How did I go from not being funny enough to even be allowed in the online version of the Fourum, to being so funny that I'm now in the paper.

Matt, you told my friend to call you A.S.A.P., but you didn't leave your number. So, call her again because I'm tired of hearing about it.

The good thing about Paul White - if he steps any further to the left, he might fall off the face of the earth.

If you want to see a natural disaster, give me a 12-pack of beer and some chili.

God, help me, I have man-boobs!

My roommate found a toenail in his Chinese food, and then my other roommate continued eating it. Now that's gross.

TO THE EDITOR

Eskridge citizen works for 35 years to help community; students could benefit from hearing her speak tonight

Editor,

It came to my attention just over a month ago that a truly magnificent woman and American icon lived less than an hour's drive away from Manhattan in the little town of Eskridge, Kan.

This nationally recognized woman is a model of what people can do when they set their hearts on achieving a goal, and for the first time, she is coming to speak to K-State and Manhattan about her accomplishment.

Her name is Maisie Devore, and her story is as compelling as any I have ever heard. Devore has been collecting aluminum cans over the course of the last 35 years in pursuit of a goal to construct and maintain an in-ground pool for the city of Eskridge. She came up with the idea more than three decades ago as a result of making multiple trips to the nearby lake for her children to swim on the weekends. She wanted Eskridge to have a pool, but the city council at the time did not support her endeavor, and the name "Crazy Maisie" became all too commonplace.

Driving an old pickup and armed with the guts to do something nearly everyone around her thought was impossible, Devore has collected more than 90 tons of cans during the past 35 years. With some help from the state of Kansas, Devore opened the only public pool in Eskridge more than a year ago.

The city gave her nothing more than water for the pool and still to this day does not support the pool financially. It runs on a can-recycling program and other support activities often organized by Devore's family.

Although the pool is up and running, anything any student organizations could do to help Devore would be truly appreciated, not only by her, but also by the hundreds of children who frequent the pool every year.

Maintenance, lifeguard wages and a new pool cover are on the current necessities list. If nothing else, it is just about time we get this woman's name out to the city of Manhattan, especially to every student here at K-State.

Devore will be speaking about her life and her pool at 7:30 tonight in McCain Auditorium. Admittance is free.

Come hear how a woman of wits and perseverance became a statewide treasure and hero.

Senate approves Sept. 11 commission

By Curt Anderson
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — The Senate voted overwhelmingly Tuesday to create an independent commission to conduct a broad investigation into intelligence failures and other government missteps before the Sept. 11 attacks and recommend how to prevent future disasters.

"If we don't come to terms with the whole truth by looking back at what happened, we can never move forward with the knowledge and confidence we need to set things right," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn., a chief sponsor along with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz.

The Senate voted 90-8 to attach to the Department of Homeland Security bill an amendment authorizing the 10-member commission.

The bill has been stalled for weeks in a partisan dispute over worker rights. A new bipartisan proposal on the labor issues raised hopes that the stalemate on the homeland security bill might soon end, despite opposition from most Republicans and the president. Bush urged lawmakers after a Cabinet meeting to act quickly to create a department he can sign into law.

"There's still time to get a homeland security bill done, one which will ... give us the tools necessary to protect the homeland," Bush said.

The Sept. 11 commission idea, championed by many victims' families, became unstoppable when the Bush administration last week dropped its opposition.

Although differences must be worked out with a House version and with the White House, it is clear that the commission will be created.

"We'll be fine. We're working with them," McCain said.

All the senators who voted against the commission are Republicans: Sens. Kit Bond, Missouri; Thad Cochran, Mississippi; Phil Gramm, Texas; Judd Gregg, New Hampshire; Trent Lott, Mississippi; Richard Lugar, Indiana; Craig Thomas, Wyoming; and George Voinovich, Ohio. Not voting were Sens. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, and Max Baucus, D-Mont.

The Senate-created commission's probe would be much broader than a House version, which was limited mainly to post-Sept. 11 intelligence questions.

The Senate panel would have authority to look into the roles of law enforcement, commercial aviation, U.S. diplomacy, border control and immigration, along with intelligence.

An initial report would be due within six months, with a final report within a year, on recommendations to prevent future attacks. The measure authorizes $3 million to cover the commission's costs.

Stephen Push, leader of a group of Sept. 11 victims' families, said the families were thrilled by the solid Senate vote.

"We are trying to keep other families from suffering the way we suffered," said Push, whose wife died in the hijacked plane that rammed the Pentagon.

College students eligible for jury duty despite class schedule

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Turning 18 doesn't just enable one to buy cigarettes and lottery tickets.

It also enables one to be summoned for jury duty.

However, for many college students, serving jury duty can interfere with class schedules.

Pam Clark, Riley County jury duty coordinator, said students can request to be excused for this reason.

"You are not exempt from serving because of being a student," Clark said. "It just depends on what you have scheduled that day."

The judge will decide if the student can be excused, she said.

Anyone who is 18 years old and is registered to vote or has a driver's license is eligible. Names are randomly selected from both driver's license and voter registration lists. Individuals are selected to serve for the county in which they claim residency.

Clark said that when individuals are selected they are "on-call" for three months. Within that period, they can serve on a jury three times.

In Riley County, jurors are paid $10 each day they are in court, even if they are not selected for the jury panel. They also are allotted a cents-per-mile fee for traveling to and from the courthouse if they live outside city limits.

Clark said of those summoned, a jury panel then is selected. No preparation is needed if chosen.

"They don't need to prepare," she said. "All the instructions are given to them when they report."

Amanda Helten, graduate student in accounting, said she was called twice to serve.

The first time she was excused because of classes. However, she had to serve the second time. Helten, because she is from Cheney, Kan., was summoned to serve in Sedgwick County. She was working in Wichita for the summer and had to miss two days of work.

"I thought it was stupid," Helten said. "I was so mad. Nobody likes to do jury duty, and it's not that I minded giving my time for it, but I only live in Sedgwick County for three months of the year, and the rest of the time I am here. I think it is stupid I had to serve there when most of my time is spent here."

She was one of 18 selected for the questioning process, where the judge and counsel ask questions to determine a fair and unprejudiced jury. But she was not selected for the 12-member jury.

"It was kind of neat, but I wouldn't want to necessarily do it again," she said. "It was kind of a waste of time."

Leslye Haller, K-State senior administrative assistant, said she has served on two juries, including the Skylor Alexander murder trial last spring.

She said the judge makes it very clear that the trial will take precedence over anything else.

"They make it very clear that once you are chosen, that's it, and it's your life for however long you are chosen to be on it," Haller said.

Haller said that during the questioning process, students should answer questions honestly. Don't try to answer questions incorrectly to dodge serving, she said.

If selected, Haller also advised students to follow the guidelines, such as refraining from media and discussing the case. She said it keeps the juror unbiased.

Haller said just like everyone else, she dreads receiving the jury duty letter in the mail. But, she said, serving is beneficial because it allows one to see the judicial system firsthand and to learn more about people.

Students should serve if given the opportunity, she said.

"It's good for you," she said. "It's a good learning experience — a good growing experience for you as a person."

Schedule favorable for Cats

K-State should breeze through conference play, win Big 12 North

BEN FEHR

Kirk Herbstreit picked K-State to win the Big 12 North Division this year.

Herbstreit has his reasons, and I have mine, but we do agree on at least one key point — the Wildcats' schedule is set up for K-State to have a big year.

I'll break this one down for you game by game. I think the Cats will go undefeated in conference play this year.

Here's why. After topping then No. 11 USC on Saturday, K-State moves into conference action Oct. 5, facing a Colorado Buffalo team fresh off a solid win over UCLA.

Although the game is going to be played in Boulder, K-State hasn't lost at Folsom Field since 1996. Don't look for that to change this year.

Buffalo quarterback Craig Ochs is out after two many concussions had him feeling like a 21-year-old Troy Aikman.

And backup QB Robert Hodge won't get the job done.

After Colorado, K-State will face the Oklahoma State Cowboys on Oct. 12. Okie State is now 2-2 after dropping contests to Louisiana Tech and UCLA and will likely be blown out by Texas before coming in to face the Cats. Ouch.

Texas follows the week after Oklahoma State, and — don't kid yourself — the Longhorns have it all. But Texas has a big fat zero in the wins column versus K-State since the inception of the Big 12.

Also, the 'Horns will face Oklahoma the week before coming to Manhattan and will likely be banged up after the usually heated Red River Shootout.

Baylor is next. The Bears also have never topped K-State in Big 12 play, but the confidence builder in this one is that Baylor has never beaten any Big 12 team in conference play.

Kansas doesn't exactly loom large the week after Baylor. It's going to take more than the Jayhawks' new uniforms to steer this team away from glaring mediocrity. Look for KU to be 1-8 before they play host to K-State and 1-9 after.

Iowa State will come calling on Homecoming, Nov. 9, and it will bring essentially the same team the Cats manhandled 42-3 last year in Ames, Iowa.

This year, however, the Cyclones come to Manhattan, and K-State will have 2000-01 Iowa State associate head coach Bob Elliott on our side this time.

And then there's Nebraska. I don't know where the Huskers will be at when this point of the season rolls around.

But after the blow-out early by Penn State, quarterback questions and a 0-2 record in their two contests in Manhattan, you've got to think Nebraska isn't looking forward to facing the Cats, in 2002.

After NU, K-State will trek west to Columbia.

Missouri started this season well by beating Illinois.

The Tigers then beat up on Ball State, but got beaten up by Bowling Green. To make things worse, Illinois' status has gone from questionable to desperate after a home loss to San Jose State.

The Tigers are now left with a number of questions concerning the plausibility of a successful year and could very well be facing an 11-0 Wildcat bunch in their last home game of the year Nov. 23.

So there you go. A scenario where K-State runs the table in the Big 12 regular season and goes on to the Big 12 championship.

Karen Mikols | COLLEGIAN

Sisters Erin and Amy Mortimer run on the K-State cross country team together this year. This is Erin's first year on the team and Amy's last.

Mortimer sisters compete, race together

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State cross country coach Randy Cole said he knew he had to keep an open mind going into the first competition of the 2002 season.

It would just be too easy to assume the little sister of his best runner would live up to all his hopes and expectations.

What were the odds of two sisters dominating his cross country team? He had already received a three-time All-American gift from the Mortimer family. But he has struck gold twice, this time with Erin, three years Amy's junior.

When heading into the first competition, he said the last thing he wanted to do was make assumptions. Erin will be Erin, he decided, and he'd have to be happy with that.

"I've just been trying to be open-minded," Cole said. "They are two really different people. Now I am trying to learn Erin's strengths and weaknesses — trying to evaluate her. And it's an ongoing process."

But, as the season continues, keeping an open mind about the Mortimer sisters has become more difficult. While Cole wanted to be sure and not saddle Erin with unrealistic expectations, she has proven she can run with some of the best.

In the K-State Harrier Relays, the only event so far in which both of the Mortimers have competed, Erin finished only two seconds behind Amy.

On or off the course, the sisters couldn't be more in step. Posing for a picture, they couldn't stop laughing and mocking one another. Nothing mean-spirited, just fun.

"Amy broke the camera," Erin said,

"I've always been a big K-State fan, and they have a good track program. I didn't even take any other visits."

Erin Mortimer
FRESHMAN
CROSS COUNTRY

causing her sister to break down laughing.

While Erin was posed atop Memorial Stadium, striking an uncharacteristically serious look, Amy did everything possible to break her sister's concentration. Finally it worked, and Erin had to look away.

When on the course, though, the Mortimers compete. Not against each other like sibling rivalry dictates — rather, they compete with each other.

Now, competing together for the first time this year since Amy was a senior in high school, they said they don't feel pressure to outshine each other.

"People like to think that, 'Oh your little sister is going to beat you,'" Amy said. "With Erin, though, I don't worry about it. I don't know why people always say that. It's just an annoying thing people say. We work together a lot, and we feed off each other."

Erin felt the same way. Rather than constantly trying to upstage her big sister, she is comfortable allowing Amy take the spotlight.

"It takes the pressure off me because I know she's going to do really well, and everyone is going to be watching her," Erin said. "I try to go out there and do what I can do, and I don't think about what Amy did."

Whether she wants to openly admit it or not, Erin does spend a lot of time doing what Amy does.

Amy started running when she was about 12 years old. Erin picked it up a year later because she didn't want to miss out on all the fun and a cross country bus trip her sister got to go on.

"I just didn't want to be left out," Erin said.

"Yeah, she wanted to go on an exciting bus trip with me for 36 hours," Amy added.

After the sisters successfully led their high school team in 1998, Amy began looking for a college where she could continue to compete.

"I visited Penn State, Missouri and Nebraska," Amy said.

But the Riley County native felt most at home at K-State.

"I liked the cross country team, and I really loved the girls here," Amy said. "It just felt like it was the right choice for me."

For Erin, though, the choice wasn't as complicated. Why did she come to K-State?

"Because of my dear, loving sister," she said. "I've always been a big K-State fan, and they have a good track program. I didn't even take any other visits."

Yes, the Mortimers do things together.

Now, they are together again on the same team. They get along, and they help each other out, and that's the way they like it.

"We don't race against each other — really, it is more like a supportive role," Amy said. "We can always talk about our problems, or each other, but we really don't talk about running that much."

Wildcats look to build on weekend victory at Baylor with another win at Iowa State

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After a three-game sweep against Baylor last weekend, the volleyball team will look to continue its success on the road tonight against Iowa State.

The Cats (5-5, 1-1) travel north to take on the Cyclones (9-4, 0-2), a team that hasn't had a lot of positive things to talk about for the past few years.

Since Cyclone coach Linda Crum took over four years ago, Iowa State is just 18-77 and winless in six tries against the Cats.

Despite not being one of the top teams in the conference, Coach Suzie Fritz said the Cats can't look past Iowa State.

Every win is important.

"Last year they started mostly freshmen," she said.

"So I would think they would be better than last year."

And last year, the Cats didn't have a lot of success against the Cyclones.

They won both meetings, but with Iowa State being one of the worst teams in the conference, the Cats weren't able to finish their competition quickly.

Iowa State took K-State to a fourth game before finally losing in Ames.

"For whatever reason, we played four games up there, and didn't play well," Fritz said.

"We're playing at a high school, which will be an unfamiliar setting so we'll have to get used to that."

The match will be at Valley High School in Des Moines, Iowa.

Meanwhile, K-State is looking to build on its road win in Waco, Texas against Baylor last weekend.

The win over the Bears snapped a four-match losing streak, K-State's longest since 1997.

But that losing streak is in the past, and Fritz said the team is hoping to build on the Baylor win.

K-State | Cats-Buffs game picked up by ABC

ABC Television has selected K-State's game at Colorado as one of its four regional games for Oct. 5, the Big 12 Conference office announced Monday.

Air time for the game in Boulder, Colo., will be 2:30 p.m. Central Time 1:30.

The game will be K-State's second TV appearance this year — the Wildcats were host to USC on Sept. 21 as the debut of the TBS Superstation's Big 12 package for the 2002 season.

The K-State-Colorado matchup will be seen in 19 percent of the nation's homes, according to the Big 12 office. Other ABC games selected for Oct. 5 were Penn State at Wisconsin, Wake Forest at Georgia Tech and UCLA at Oregon State.

NFL | Former Chief dies

Mike Webster, the Hall of Fame center who helped the Pittsburgh Steelers win four Super Bowls and whose life spiraled into drug use and homelessness after he retired, died Tuesday at age 50.

Webster died in the coronary care unit at Allegheny General Hospital, but the hospital did not announce a cause of death.

Known as "Iron Mike" for his toughness and durability, Webster was considered one of the game's greatest centers, and he was voted in 2000 to the All-Time NFL Team. During his career from 1974-90, he made the Pro Bowl nine times and won four Super Bowls in his first six seasons.

When he was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1997, Webster was separated from his wife and children. There also were reports he was heavily in debt, living in his car at times and suffering from depression and memory loss.

Recently, Webster was living in suburban Pittsburgh with his son, Garrett, a senior lineman in high school.

Webster left the Steelers after the 1988 season and played his final two years with the Kansas City Chiefs.

Around Kansas | Wichita State looking to change logo

Bowing quickly to unfavorable public response, Wichita State University is dropping a new logo unveiled just last week and going back to the drawing board.

The school paid New York-based Phoenix Design Works $17,000 for the new look logo, which featured bolder, more stylized stalks of wheat. The name of the university was in the middle of a shield, with the Shockers nickname below it.

Schaus wanted something that gave the university better brand-name identification, featuring consistent use of colors and typefaces, something quickly distinguishing it from other schools such as Washington State, Weber State, Wright State and Wayne State.

MLB | Teenager wants more time

The teenager who ran on the field with his father during a game and attacked Kansas City Royals coach Tom Gamboa will spend at least two more weeks in custody.

The 15-year-old boy's lawyer was granted a request Tuesday for more time to gather evidence. A trial date has not been set.

The teenager is charged with aggravated battery — a felony.

If he is convicted, the boy's sentence could range from probation to five years in a youth detention center, Assistant State's Attorney Catherine Gregorovic said.

After Tuesday's brief hearing, Assistant Public Defender Christopher Swanson would not say why he didn't ask the judge to release his client from a juvenile facility. The boy's mother refused to comment.

Basketball | USA women capture gold

Lisa Leslie had 24 points and 13 rebounds to lead the defending champion United States past Australia 71-56 Tuesday and into the finals of the Women's World Basketball Championship.

Shannon Johnson scored 15 of her 17 points in the second quarter, and Cheryl Swoopes added 13 points and nine rebounds for the Americans, who will face Russia in the title game Wednesday. The Russians advanced with a 70-53 victory over South Korea.

The U.S. team limited Lauren Jackson of the Seattle Storm to nine points. The Australians were led by Suzy Batkovic's 13 points.

Leslie, playing in her third championship tournament, became the U.S. team's all-time leading scorer and rebounder in the championship. Her 376 points surpassed the previous mark of 371, set by Teresa Edwards from 1986 through '94, and her 181 rebounds surpassed Katrina McClain's record of 180 from 1986-94.

Israel ignores U.N. Security Council's orders to end siege of Arafat's West Bank headquarters

By Jamie Tarabay
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Israel defied a U.N. Security Council demand Tuesday to end its six-day siege of Yasser Arafat's devastated West Bank headquarters, and nine Palestinians were killed in an Israeli strike against alleged munitions factories and other targets in Gaza City.

Israel's siege drew criticism from President Bush and many Israelis who questioned the wisdom of a military operation that may have boosted the Palestinian leader's popularity at a time when voices had begun to be heard urging him to share power.

Sporadic pro-Arafat demonstrations persisted Tuesday despite curfews imposed in the West Bank in an effort to halt suicide attacks.

With the United States abstaining, the Security Council demanded early Tuesday that Israel end its operations, "including the destruction of Palestinian civilian and security infrastructure." The resolution also called on the Palestinian Authority to ensure "those responsible for terrorist acts are brought to justice."

In Washington, Bush said, "We've got to end the suffering. I thought the actions the Israelis took were not helpful in terms of the establishment and development of the institutions necessary for a Palestinian state to emerge."

Unmoved, Israeli Defense Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer said that "no resolution, and no person, can take from us our exclusive right to defend our homes, our people."

Cabinet Secretary Gideon Saar said the siege would continue until some 200 people inside the compound give up, asserting many are terrorists who must be put on trial. Apparently hinting at possible use of force, he added, "I'm not convinced it will end in them being given up — but it must end with their capture."

Palestinians took heart from the U.N. resolution. Arafat released a statement praising it, and Cabinet Minister Saeb Erekat said it should be enforced, "because Israel is the champion of nations undermining Security Council resolutions and not implementing" them.

Telephone lines to Arafat's building were cut Tuesday, Palestinians said, leaving Arafat and his aides with only cellular phones to communicate with the outside world. Israel's army denied any knowledge of the cut lines.

Israeli soldiers, tightly ring-fencing Arafat's building with tanks, didn't allow visitors inside, but the military eased restrictions for reporters in the rest of Ramallah, letting them enter and leave town.

Only two weeks ago, Arafat absorbed his worst-ever internal setback when the Palestinian legislature forced his Cabinet to resign, reflecting growing popular discontent with government mismanagement and the handling of the two years of violence with Israel.

Before Thursday — when Israeli tanks attacked Arafat's compound in response to two Palestinian suicide bombings that left the bombers and seven other people dead — Palestinians were openly discussing limiting Arafat's powers.

Now, the mood may have shifted. Masked gunmen opened fire Tuesday at the house of Nabil Amr, Palestinian security officials said. No one was hurt. Amr is a former Arafat aide turned critic who is a leading voice calling for a prime minister to take over some of Arafat's duties.

Earlier Tuesday, dozens of Israeli tanks moved deep into Gaza City, exchanging fire with Palestinian gunmen and killing nine people, including six civilians.

The Israeli military said its forces blew up 13 weapons workshops and the house of a Hamas militant who killed five Israeli teenagers in a shooting rampage in a Jewish settlement in Gaza earlier this year.

Palestinians said it was the largest Israeli operation in Gaza during two years of fighting, involving about 60 tanks and armored vehicles.

K-State showing signs of greatness

Am I being optimistic? Sure. Am I being unrealistic? Hardly. Anybody who watched the USC game knows what K-State does well — everything.

The Cats' defense was tough, forcing a highly touted Trojan offense into punting the ball away 11 times on Saturday.

Ell Roberson showed he has the stuff to make the offense tick top-rated defenses, leading K-State to more than 300 yards of total offense.

And the Wildcats' special teams will always be a disciplined part of the football team.

I don't claim to be able to see the future, but I do know the Cats have a good shot at a banner year for football.

VOLLEYBALL | Wildcats

look to continue winning ways

"The win is certainly important," she said.

"If you want to be good in the conference, you have to be able to get some significant road wins. Baylor was the first of hopefully many."

The most noticeable difference against Baylor was the Cats' ability to defend better and serve effectively.

K-State had 13.5 blocks in the win, led by sophomore Lisa Martin who had seven unassisted.

They also scored on 10 serving aces — junior Car Jensen had four of them.

"There were a lot of things we did to disrupt Baylor's rhythm," Fritz said.

"I felt good about the way we served. And then I think we did a really nice job on Stevie Nicholas, she's one of best outside hitters in the conference, and she hit 14 percent so that shows Gabby (Guerre) and Katie (Stanzel) did a nice job of containing the left side."

K-State, however, will face a different look when it squares against Iowa State.

"I know they're big," Fritz said.

"They're physical and they can be good when they're in system."

The Cats' meeting with the Cyclones will be the 60th, which marks the third-most against any one team in Wildcat history.

K-State has played Nebraska 66 times and Kansas 84.

The Cyclones maintain a slight 33-27 advantage over the Cats, but Fritz said the team is looking to build on their recent controlling ways over Iowa State.

But more than anything, the team is focused on getting Big 12 wins, and getting past the four losses at the beginning of the season.

"We really haven't been playing terrible all along," Fritz said.

"We've been playing OK but it's an young team with only one senior so we have some growing to do."

U.S. sends troops to West Africa

American school children held hostage in Ivory Coast battle

By Alexandra Zavis
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ABIDJAN, Ivory Coast — U.S. troops headed to West Africa on Tuesday to safeguard 100 American school children holed up in a rebel-held city after the bloodiest-ever uprising in the Ivory Coast. Frightened residents reported heavy artillery and gunfire.

French troops moved closer to the central city of Bouake as well, ready to rescue their nationals and other Westerners if Ivory Coast's government makes good on a pledge to root out forces behind a bloody coup attempt Thursday.

"A very welcome development," said a relieved James Forlines, director of Free Will Baptist Foreign Missions, a Nashville, Tenn.-based church group that had sent calls for help overnight for the mission school in the cut-off city after rebels breached the school's walls, firing from its grounds.

"It has been a very trying day. It has been a very trying five days," mission official Neil Gilliland said.

The scrambling to safeguard Westerners in the Ivory Coast came amid clashes and growing tensions after the failed coup. At least 270 people have died so far.

An American expeditionary force and British troops already were on the ground in Ivory Coast, Ghanaian and French military and government officials said.

"The U.S. European Command is moving forces to be in a closer position to provide for the safety of American citizens," a statement from the command said.

U.S. military aircraft were expected late Tuesday or early Wednesday at a base at Ghana's capital, Accra, a senior official in Ghana's Foreign Ministry said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The base was expected to be the staging area for any U.S. evacuation.

"There's fighting going on now in the area near where this school is located. That's what our concern is," State Department spokesman Richard Boucher explained in Washington about the children and staff of Bouake's International Christian Academy.

Tensions were "understandably high" at the school, Boucher added, but all students and staff are believed to be safe.

U.S. defense officials spoke of deployment of fewer than 200 American troops. No general evacuation of Americans was planned, Boucher said.

One hundred French troops moved up from their own staging area at Ivory Coast's capital, Yamoussoukro, where helicopters and trucks were standing by to ferry out foreigners.

"We want to get closer so that if the belligerents — whoever they are — attack our nationals, we can intervene very quickly," said French army Col. Charles de Kersabiec said. France is Ivory Coast's former colonial ruler.

Bands to perform at Dave's tonight

Scholar will take stage following Common Ground

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At least one band will be making rock music scholarly tonight.

Scholar and Common Ground will take the stage at Dave's Hideaway at 9:30 tonight. Cover is $3 at the door.

Scholar became a band last October when graduate students Tom O'Toole and Ryan Hurley, both guitarists and vocalists, found out they both played guitar and started jamming. They picked up drummer Travis Roberts, sophomore in speech, and did a few shows. They subsequently added bassist Michael Haag, senior in marketing, and they have been together, writing music and doing shows ever since.

Scholar will open with Common Ground starting around 11 tonight. They will then play until closing time.

This is what Hurley had to say about taking the stage with Common Ground tomorrow:

Q: What kind of music can people expect to hear Wednesday night?

A: You can definitely expect rock music. We have three songwriters, and you can expect stuff that has more of a Weezer feel. Some has more of a pop feel, like Our Lady Peace. Then there will be some jam- and punk-influenced songs as well. And Common Ground will play pretty much rock music with a few covers.

Q: What type of people do you expect to be there?

A: Pretty much anyone who wants to listen to some good rock music. We tend to bring a more pop-rock type crowd, but it's always a really good crowd.

I think the combination of Scholar and Common Ground works perfectly. I mean, we mix really well together. And we will both have our fans there for a good time. It'll be a good rock show.

Q: Will Dave's Hideaway be a unique venue in any way?

A: I personally think this is the best place to play in town, just because they devote themselves to local music. So people can come out and see some local musicians all the time. I mean, you have Open Mic Night on Mondays and then they are starting to bring out local bands on Wednesday nights.

Q: Why do you guys call yourself Scholar?

A: We're called scholar because a girl in our grad school said we weren't scholarly enough to be in grad school. She said since we were in a rock band and drank a lot of beer we shouldn't be considered scholarly. So we said, "Screw you, we're Scholar."

Banned Books Week to educate public

By Courtney Duffield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Millions of moviegoers flocked to see "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" last fall, but checking out the book at some libraries might not be so easy.

The Harry Potter books, by J. K. Rowling, are some of numerous books that have either been banned or challenged by various groups. Sept. 21 to 28 is Banned Books Week. The purpose of the week is to inform the public of books that have been banned, said Jodi Crocker, Hale Library assistant.

Ron Ratliff, human resource librarian, said it is important to express Americans' right to read what they want.

"It celebrates the freedom to read, and our right, as Americans, to read what we want," Ratliff said.

Ratliff said the Harry Potter series is the most popular group of books that has been recently challenged.

"There have been concerns over witchcraft in the books," he said. "Sometimes complaints have been logged as to Harry's willingness to break laws."

Some books that Ratliff mentioned for being frequently challenged were J. D. Salinger's "Catcher in the Rye," for its language, and Maurice Sendak's "In the Night Kitchen," which depicts some frontal nudity in an illustration.

Books about gay and lesbian couples are now being challenged more frequently as well, he said.

"Any children's book that depicts gay couples gets a lot of attention and is generally challenged," he said.

Crocker said books are challenged for a variety of reasons. Some of the reasons she named were magic, the use of four-letter words, inappropriateness for the age level and the type of community of the library or school.

"One book can be banned in a library but required for a course," Crocker said.

Ratliff said libraries do various things to promote Banned Book Week. He said that when he was a high school librarian, he would make a display about the various kinds of books that had been banned and why and where they were banned. Some libraries display posters or have read-outs where participants read out loud for a set amount of time from banned books. Some teachers will make assignments for students to go out and research why and how certain books were banned, Ratliff said.

"A read-out is a fun way to promote Banned Book Week on campuses because you can walk by and listen to them on your break," Ratliff said. "KU has had one that didn't deal directly with Banned Book Week, but they read 'Moby Dick' for 24 hours straight."

Ratliff said banned books do not affect college students much, because college libraries are generally research libraries. But college students should still be concerned, he said, because when books are banned anywhere, it takes away people's right to choose what they read.

"I would encourage students, when they have the time, to check out one of the books that has been challenged and read and enjoy it. That is what they were written for — to be enjoyed," Ratliff said.

2001's most frequently challenged

1. The "Harry Potter" series, by J.K. Rowling, has been challenged for its focus on wizardry and magic.
2. "Of Mice and Men," by John Steinbeck, for using offensive language and being unsuited to age group.
3. "The Chocolate War," by Robert Cormier, for using offensive language and being unsuited to age group.
4. "I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings," by Maya Angelou, for sexual content, racism, offensive language, violence and being unsuited to age group.
5. "Summer of My German Soldier," by Bette Greene, for racism, offensive language and being sexually explicit.
6. "The Catcher in the Rye," by J.D. Salinger, for offensive language and being unsuited to age group.
7. "Alice" series, by Phyllis Reynolds Naylor, for being sexually explicit, using offensive language and being unsuited to age group.
8. "Go Ask Alice" by an anonymous author, for being sexually explicit, for offensive language and drug use.
9. "Fallen Angels," by Walter Dean Myers, for offensive language and being unsuited to age group.
10. "Blood and Chocolate," by Annette Curtis Klause, for being sexually explicit and unsuited to age group.

Federal Reserve leaves key interest rate unchanged

Officials hope consumers will spend more

By Jeannine Aversa
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — With two members dissenting, the Federal Reserve left a key interest rate unchanged Tuesday as the nation's economic recovery struggles to ride out the roller-coaster stock market and rising worries about war with Iraq.

While the Fed held short-term interest rates steady, it continued to leave the door open to future rate reductions if economic conditions worsen.

By keeping rates low or possibly nudging them down later, Fed policy-makers hope to motivate consumers to spend more and businesses to ramp up investment, something that would strengthen the fragile recovery.

Two of the 12 Fed members — Edward Gramlich and Robert McTeer — voted against the central bank's decision on Tuesday to leave rates unchanged. They wanted to see the rate lowered.

The Fed said that economic information since its last meeting on Aug. 13 suggests that consumer and business demand is "growing at a moderate pace."

Over time, the Fed's currently low interest rates and gains in productivity should be "sufficient to foster an improving business climate," it said.

However, the Fed said that "considerable uncertainty persists about the extent and timing of the expected pickup in production and employment owing in part to the emergence of heightened geopolitical risks."

For now, Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan and his Federal Open Market Committee colleagues opted to hold the federal funds rate — the interest that banks charge each other on overnight loans — at 1.75 percent, the lowest level in 41 years. It marked the sixth consecutive Fed meeting this year that policy-makers decided to leave rates alone.

However, the Fed continued to view the possibility of weak economic conditions, rather than inflation, as the greatest risk to the economy. That signaled that the Fed is prepared to cut rates, if necessary.

President Bush remained upbeat, telling reporters at the White House that "when you combine the productivity of the American people with low interest rates and low inflation, those are the ingredients for growth."

But we have more work to do," he said. "There are things that Congress and the administration can do together to make sure that people work."

The Fed's decision to hold the funds rate steady means that commercial banks' prime lending rate — the benchmark for many loans — will remain at 4.75 percent, the lowest level since November 1965.

After being knocked down by last year's recession, the economy is back on its feet but isn't bursting with vitality.

Stock market woes, a stagnant job market and heightened concerns about a war with Iraq could threaten the recovery. In addition, a report Tuesday showed that consumers' confidence in the economy sank in September to its lowest level in 10 months, raising new questions about consumers' willingness to spend in the coming months.

Businesses, meanwhile, have remained reluctant to make big commitments in hiring and capital spending, two factors restraining the recovery. Manufacturing — hardest hit by the recession — lost considerable momentum in August.

Economists say a sustained turnaround in business investment — a necessary ingredient for the economy to get back to full health — won't come about until companies feel better about the economy and see their profits, which took a hit during the slump, recover.

Layoffs have been rising recently, and economists are predicting that the nation's jobless rate — now at 5.7 percent — will probably increase slightly in the months ahead.

Consumers, whose spending accounts for two-thirds of all economic activity in the United States, have been the primary engine keeping the economy going. They have taken advantage of free-financing deals to buy automobiles and home appliances. And, low interest rates have motivated them to buy homes at such a brisk pace that experts predict both sales of new and existing homes will set records this year.

Low interest rates, good deals, rising home values and extra cash coming from a refinancing boom are all helping to support consumer spending.

Thus far, those positive factors have offset some negative ones, including the volatile stock market, the lackluster job market and eroding consumer confidence.

Consumer confidence fell for the fourth month in a row in September, sinking to its lowest level since November, the Conference Board reported. The board's Consumer Confidence Index fell to 93.3 from a revised 94.5 in August.

For short-term interest rates to move even lower, the Fed would probably need to see clear trouble signs that the nation's economy was slipping back into recession, analysts say. While many analysts consider a "double dip" recession scenario remote, it can't be ruled out, they say.

A dramatic and prolonged rise in energy prices stoked by Middle East tensions, a big cutback in spending by consumers — the driving force behind the economy — would probably send the economy into a nose-dive, analysts say.

The economy grew at a tepid 1.1 percent in the second quarter, but could grow at a rate of around 3 percent or more in the current quarter.

But increasing numbers of economists believe the economy will lose momentum again during the final quarter of this year.

DEAN | Faculty looking forward to permanent hire

Lori Bergen, search committee member and associate professor of journalism and mass communications, said delaying the search will have a minimal effect on the campus.

"As the largest college on campus, we must have a permanent dean," Bergen said. "We can't go on forever. As a faculty member, it will be nice to get this settled, but we're still in great shape."

Hamilton said the importance of a permanent dean is reflected through the dean's ability to make contacts with alumni to build relationships.

"These relationships with alumni to secure fund raising are a crucial aspect of the dean's jobs," Hamilton said. "A permanent dean will be able to build long-term relationships that will help the college."

According to www.ksu.edu/artsci, the college has more than 20 academic departments and serves more than 7,000 students, which is the largest enrollment of any K-State college.

"The college has half of all university faculty members," Coffman said. "It's critical to find and appoint a permanent dean."

FAIR | Job-seekers looking for leads at Career Fair

Oberle said that from the company's point of view, a Career Fair can be a good way to screen potential employees.

"You can tell the ones that can't communicate well," he said. "Then there are ones who ask questions and have done research on the company that you can't just get off the Web site."

Schuley said the employers she spoke with all valued the K-State Career Fair because of the accommodations they receive, but she also hopes the students understand how readily available the Career Fair is for them.

"I would hope with a Career Fair with 250 employers that is so easy to get to, it would be encouraging to students to come out," she said.

Kasmarick said she found the Career Fair to be helpful, not only because she was able to see the different companies hiring people in her major, but also because it helped her see what she wants for her future.

"Getting to talk to someone who works there is great," she said. "It helped me to see where I want to end up."

CEMETERY | Fort Riley Cemetery nearing capacity; officials seeking additional lands to accommodate burials

assume it will be out of spots within the next six months.

To be buried in the cemetery, a person has to be an active-duty soldier, retiree or dependent of one of the two.

"If you have a family member who is already buried in the cemetery, then there is a way for you to also be buried there one day if you would like," Vanover said.

She said the deceased can be buried with family members.

Fort Riley officials are also considering donating land for a new veteran cemetery located near the Manhattan Airport.

"There are 85 acres near the airport that will be a state veteran cemetery operated by Kansas," said Wayne Bollig, chief operation officer of the Kansas Commission on Veteran Affairs.

"It will be built on 100 percent federal funds and operated by the Kansas Commission on Veteran Affairs."

K-State is looking into the area to make sure it is environmentally safe, Bollig said.

"There is a lengthy list of criteria that we have to follow," Bollig said. "We have to make sure there is no hazardous material in the area and that there are no historical aspects of the land we will get in the way of and a number of other things."

Larry Erickson, chemical engineering professor, is the director of The Great Plains/Rocky Mountain Hazardous Substance Research Center.

He said that so far, a month of research has shown the site to be very sufficient. "We don't want to ruin any natural habitats or any of the wildlife's home area in the process, so that is why we are there looking at the land - so they aren't endangered," Erickson said.

Once this process is completed, Fort Riley will have to give an approval and go through the process of giving away the land, Bollig said.

"After we have an approval, we have a deed, and from there we try and get a federal grant to make everything happen," he said.

SEX

"Some people can't get away with it in high school — you see the same people every day. Here you can do something with one girl one night and then get away with doing it with another girl the next night."

Intercourse popular; motives unclear

By Kacia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Chances are you're having sex. Since more than 80 percent of college-age people are sexually active, most likely you, your best friend or both are doing the deed. "It is a majority," said Carol Kennedy, director of health and education promotion for Lafene Health Center. "When people come in, we pretty much assume they are sexually active."

Perhaps the high prevalence of sex wouldn't be such a bad thing if it weren't for sexually transmitted diseases and emotions that get intertwined with sexual partners, officials said.

Sex at K-State

Statistics are based on a student population of 22,000.

■ If 80 percent of college students are sexually active, then 17,600 K-State students have sex.

■ If 60 percent of college students engage in casual sex, then 13,200 K-State students have casual sex.

■ If 87 percent of college students do not consistently use a condom, then 19,104 K-State students do not consistently use condoms.

David Thompson, who used to teach You and Your Sexuality, said students — especially women who did not have good relationships with their fathers — sometimes go looking for love in the wrong places, substituting sex for love.

"Young women want intimacy and are willing to settle for sex. Men are willing to provide some level of intimacy," said Thompson, senior pastor at Westview Community Church.

A night of sex can change a person emotionally and physically forever, he said.

"A lifetime with an STD is a long time to pay for a one-night stand," he said.

One in seven college students has an STD, Kennedy said. Many don't know it if they haven't been tested.

Mike Kifer, freshman in general engineering, said diseases are a concern — maybe more so at college than in high school.

"On a campus full of people you don't know, you have to worry," he said. "It's dangerous to be sexually active with people you just met."

Still, the size of the campus can be a good thing for some people's sex lives, Kevin Krumholtz, freshman in open-option, said.

"Some people can't get away with it in high school — you see the same people every day," he said. "Here you can do something with one girl one night and then get away with doing it with another girl the next night."

Kennedy warns those who are sleeping with more than one person to remember the dangers and that they can stop having sex.

"Any time a person has multiple partners and is not using a condom, they're at risk," she said. "They can postpone sex — they can stop being sexually active. It's the No. 1 birth control method as well as preventer of STDs."

Sex can be fun in the right context, Thompson said, but it's better if responsibility is included.

"Often it brings pain rather than pleasure," he said.

Views on masturbation

Masturbation, for some, is a casual conversation topic. For others, it's a private activity. Former Surgeon General Dr. M. Jocelyn Elders suggested that including masturbation in sexual education curriculum could decrease the number of sexually active people, thus diminishing the percentage of those with sexually transmitted diseases or unplanned pregnancies. Here's what people around Manhattan had to say about this "touchy" subject.

"If you're just waiting for someone, that's kind of a way for them to get their kinks out. I just think it's nasty. If you do it, you should keep it private. Some people are open about it. If they do it and they tell you, you're not going to want to touch their hands."

Bryant Grishom
SOPHOMORE IN ARCHITECTURE

"Everybody does it. There's those people who don't do it all that often. Then there's people like guys who do it two to three times a day. Then there's those with a happy medium in between. It's nothing to be ashamed about. It's part of your human nature."

Melanie Wolfington
SOPHOMORE IN GENERAL ENGINEERING

"Hell, yeah, if you're not getting laid, you've got to get it some way. It's normal. I guarantee you a guy whacks off at least once a day. It's good for period cramps — it's doctor recommended. Masturbation's the best thing in the world."

Kate Ceglarek
JUNIOR IN PUBLIC RELATIONS

"Masturbation in and of itself is probably a better alternative than to go out and seek intercourse. However, probably the thought life that goes with it — generally someone is looking at a magazine or thinking about sex with someone — morally, it's not proper to even have sex in your mind with someone."

Contraceptives offer protection for sexually active

Abstinence (100 percent effective)

No sex with partner.

Advantage: Free and available to everyone.

Disadvantage: If you're counting on abstinence, and you change your mind in the heat of the moment, you might not have birth control handy.

Condoms (86 - 98 percent effective, nearly 100 percent with withdrawal)

Condoms, made of latex, plastic, or natural membranes, are put onto penis before contact with vagina, anus or mouth.

Advantage: Condoms are the best method of preventing infection except for abstaining from sex.

Disadvantage: You cannot use oil-based lubricants such as Vaseline with latex condoms. These products put a hole in a condom in a matter of seconds.

Cervical cap (80 - 90 percent effective)

Small rubber cap. Woman puts spermicide into cap and places it into vagina onto opening of uterus or womb. Suction keeps cap in place so sperm cannot enter uterus.

Advantage: It does not matter how many times you have sex as long as you leave it in at least 6-8 hours after the last time you have sex.

Disadvantage: You must be fitted by a clinician.

Emergency contraception (75 - 85 percent effective)

Designed to prevent pregnancy after unprotected sex.

Emergency contraception pills
Two doses of hormonal pills taken 12 hours apart. Can reduce risk of pregnancy up to 120 hours after unprotected vaginal intercourse.

IUD (97.4 - 99.2 percent effective)

A small device placed into uterine cavity. Vertical arm of IUD contains hormone levonorgestrel. Levonorgestrel causes cervical mucus to become thicker so sperm cannot reach egg.

Advantage:

The IUD is the most effective reversible contraceptive method. The IUD may be left in place for at least seven years.

Disadvantage:

The IUD often changes the menstrual cycle. There are more bleeding days than normal for the first few months and less than normal after six to eight months. There is a high initial cost of insertion.

Implants — Norplant (99.95 percent effective)

Six matchstick-size rods are inserted under-skin of upper arm. Constantly releases small amounts of hormone.

Advantage: Gives continuous long-lasting birth control without sterilization — for five years.

Disadvantage:

Removal is sometimes difficult, requiring more than one appointment.

The pill (95 - 99.95 percent effective)

Birth control pills containing two hormones, estrogen and progestin.

Advantage: Pills decrease a woman's risk for cancer of the ovary and cancer of the lining of the uterus. Pills also lower the risk of developing benign breast masses and ovarian cysts.

Disadvantage: You have to remember to take one pill every day.

The ring — NuvaRing (95 - 99 percent effective)

Small, flexible ring is inserted deep into vagina. New ring is inserted for three of four weeks, releasing combined hormones that protect for one month.

Advantage: Protects against pregnancy for one month, and ability to become pregnant returns quickly when use is stopped.

Disadvantage: Possible increased vaginal discharge and vaginal irritation or infection.

The shot — Depo-Provera (99.7 percent effective)

Shot of hormone in arm or buttock from clinician every 12 weeks.

Advantage:

Helps prevent cancer of the lining of the uterus.

Disadvantage:

Loss of monthly period, change of appetite, weight gain, depression, hair loss or increased hair on the face or body, nervousness, skin rash or spotty darkening of the skin, change in sex drive.

Withdrawal (81 - 96 percent effective)

Man pulls his penis out of the vagina before he ejaculates to keep sperm from joining egg.

Advantage:

Can be used when no other method is available.

Disadvantage:

Requires great self-control, experience and trust. Not for men who ejaculate prematurely.

Man dead after I-70 accident

42-year-old killed in 2-vehicle crash on highway ramp

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A 42-year-old man died Tuesday afternoon when his car collided with a truck while trying to turn on the Interstate 70 entrance ramp, about nine miles south of Manhattan.

According to Kansas Highway Patrol reports, at about 1:36 p.m., Jurgen Luzynski, of Gelsenkirchen, Germany, was driving his Chevrolet four-door northbound on Kansas Highway 177 when he attempted to make a left turn onto the eastbound entrance ramp to I-70. Luzynski failed to yield to a southbound Dodge truck.

The truck collided with the passenger side of Luzynski's car, pushing both vehicles into the west ditch. Both vehicles caught fire.

Luzynski was unable to exit the burning vehicle and died at the scene.

The driver of the truck, Gary Johnson, 59, of Dwight, Kan., was not injured.

Johnson was hauling cattle, which were removed from the trailer before they were injured.

City to restructure utility billing

Officials hoping consolidated system improves communication

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

In response to two significant billing errors, the city of Manhattan announced an internal restructuring Wednesday.

The utility billing and meter reading operations will be restructured and consolidated, and Bernie Hayen, director of finance, will now be directly responsible for the department. The accounting and computer system functions that support the departments will remain under the finance department.

"Before all three were separate departments," City Manager Ron Fehr said. "It didn't provide for a lot of management oversight. Everyone was doing a good job at their piece of the puzzle, but this restructuring will increase efficiency and accountability. It basically ensures we are coordinating functions."

Previously, the water billing function was under the direction of Human Resources, and the water meter reading personnel was a function of the utilities department. The new structuring will now allow for better communication between the departments because of a proximity to each other, Hayen said.

"A lack of communication can kill you," he said. "In organizations that are having problems, poor communication is usually to blame. This will hopefully help

GETTING THE FIX

Caffeine is consumed by 80 to 90 percent of Americans on a daily basis.

Students cautioned to drink caffeine in moderation

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

As Matt Michaelson, junior in psychology, downs a can of pop, his friends shake their heads in disbelief.

It's not that he downed the caffeine-filled drink in 20 seconds, nor is it the way he drank it in one gulp.

It was because it was his seventh pop that day.

"People think I drink a lot of pop," Michaelson said. "But I just tell them that I'm thirsty."

Michaelson, along with thousands of other college students, are finding that caffeinated beverages, such as coffee, pop and tea, are becoming the remedy to give them the extra energy they need throughout the day.

"I just like pop," Michaelson said. "I drink a lot, and I'm always thirsty for it. I get different kinds because I just like the taste of it."

On average, Michaelson said he drinks seven or eight cans of pop a day. During a week, he usually goes through two or three 12-packs.

However, as the popularity of caffeine rises, health officials caution students to be aware of their consumption levels with caffeinated beverages.

"Be careful not to replace food with the false energy you may be getting from caffeine," Dianna Schalles, nutritionist at Lafene Health Center, said. "It will give you a temporary lift, but it's only going to be short-term."

According to the International Food Information Council, a majority of health experts agree that common sense and a moderate amount are important when consuming caffeine. Most health organizations define a moderate level of caffeine as 300 milligrams, equivalent to three cups of coffee consumed each day, Schalles said.

Moreover, Schalles said, it is important for students not to cut back on water consumption throughout the day.

"Even though you're getting fluids, don't replace the water intake you need for each day," she said.

Like Michaelson, Luke Manning, freshman in journalism and pre-medicine, admits to consuming a fair amount of caffeine each day. On average, he drinks a 24-pack of pop in a week and can drink anywhere from two to five cans of pop each day.

"It helps me stay awake during the day and keeps me focused," he said. "I usually drink most of it when I'm studying or doing my homework at night."

Along with the extra energy, Manning said that as a child, he always preferred pop above other drinks.

"That's what I drank the most when I was younger and it's just what I'm used to," he said. "The flavor is better than water."

Although caffeine is not addictive in the same sense as alcohol or nicotine, people who completely take it away from their diet after being used to drinking it in large quantities could have side effects, Schalles said.

"After being used to drinking too much caffeine, people can get headaches, irregular heart beats, trembling, fatigue and mood changes," she said. "The professionals recommend gradual withdrawals."

"They haven't found a direct link to any diseases," Schalles said. "Their research has not found any future problems for those individuals who drink caffeine in moderation."

Researchers argue worth of MBA; others find value in program

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

And the survey says: MBAs teach little of real use in the business world.

That is what two researchers at Stanford's Graduate School of Business are arguing when they called into question the value of a master's degree in business administration.

The researchers, Jeffrey Pfeffer and Christina Fong, said with the possible exception of the most elite programs, MBAs are useless in the business world and the degree has little effect on salaries in the long run. The article is the result of studying decades of research, they said.

But students and faculty at K-State are not worried about the results — they still feel confident in their program.

"I still think getting an MBA degree will teach you a lot more about the business industry," Bonnie Wetta, graduate student in business, said. "The program goes way beyond the undergraduate degree. I don't regret my decision at all."

And while the students don't regret the decision to enter graduate school, David Vruwink, director of business graduate studies, said the study reminds him of past events.

"There was a study done during the '70s that questioned the value of an undergraduate college degree," Vruwink said.

"It said college didn't pay. That was when the unions were strong and the job market was open. Now, looking back 25 years, it was a falsity. When the job market is strong, like during the 1990s when this study was completed, it is hard to determine the additional value a MBA degree offers."

And with the current weak economy, employers can be choosy and an MBA degree gives students that extra edge, Shane Van Dalsem, graduate student in business, said.

"With the job market like it is now, any advantage you can get is helpful," Van Dalsem, chairman of the Graduate Student Association, said. "I am not nervous at all about entering the job market, because I went to graduate school. A master's degree gives me an edge over others with just an undergraduate degree."

The article also questions whether the explosion in the popularity of MBAs has diluted their value. In 1956, only 3,200 MBAs were awarded. Today, that number has grown to more than 112,000, the researchers said.

While Vruwink said there might be some truth to that claim, he still doesn't think the degree is worthless.

"As the MBA supply increases, it is true that there also is going to be less value in the degree," he said, "but the survey didn't separate accredited and non-accredited MBA programs either. If the researchers would take that into consideration, there would be an increase in value."

However, there are about 350 accredited MBA programs in the United States.

To counter that problem, K-State has a graduate studies committee that reevaluates the curriculum on an almost daily level, Vruwink said. The school plans to add an information/technology track for the 2003-2004 academic school year.

"There is more of a demand for that type of degree right now," he said, "and it gives our graduates an advantage over others who graduate with their MBA degree."

The Stanford researchers also argued that students can take on as much as $100,000 in debt to pay for the two-year program.

In response, the Graduate Management Admission Council sent out results of a study showing U.S. MBA graduates have an average starting salary of $77,000 — quite a difference from an average of $50,000 with an undergraduate degree.

"That is worth it to me," Wetta said. "I don't know how they can say the degree is not valuable when there is that much difference in salaries."

Still, Vruwink said some of his students are worried, but he blames it on the current economy.

"One of my graduate students cut the article out," he said. "Sure they notice it, but when the job market is tougher, there is always going to be some doubts. I just have to try and assure them it will get better."

Eskridge resident speaks about service, recounts personal story of realized dreams

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Eskridge resident Maise DeVore gives a speech in McCain Auditorium about how she built a public swimming pool in her hometown. "I just wanted a pool for the kids. If you really want something, you believe in it and work for it," she said.

By Ashley Huseman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 35 years, community members of Eskridge, Kan., watched Maise DeVore follow her dream, and now they believe nothing in the world can take the place of persistence.

DeVore, 83, spent the last 35 years collecting aluminum cans and selling them to recycling centers in order to raise money for the construction of a swimming pool in Eskridge.

Ninety tons of cans later, DeVore has raised $100,000, and her dream came true in July 2001 when Maise's Community Swimming Pool opened.

DeVore told her story Wednesday night in McCain Auditorium at a program sponsored by K-State's National Residence Hall Honorary and the Association of Residence Halls.

"People told me I was crazy," DeVore said. "My last husband told me I'd never live to see it, but I'm still here. This was something I believed in."

DeVore said she decided to raise money for a pool because there was only one pool in all of Wabaunsee County. She said the children of Eskridge needed another recreational activity besides team sports programs, to get involved in.

"Not everyone is interested in ball, but I haven't seen a child yet that doesn't like to play in water, even if they don't know how to swim," DeVore said.

DeVore said she started by herself with nothing and was told many times she wouldn't be able to accomplish her goal, but she never gave up.

"The city council told me there was no way they could support a pool," DeVore said.

City officials also failed to turn a grant in on time, causing the construction of the pool to begin a year later than planned, DeVore said.

Now that DeVore's dream has become a reality, residents of Eskridge are supportive of the pool, which is located across the street from DeVore's home.

"I've finally made believers out of some of them," DeVore said.

The city does furnish water for the pool, but it has to be maintained by DeVore's funding. This means DeVore's work is not done, and she plans to keep raising money for the pool.

"We aren't giving up," she said. "We're going to keep on working."

DeVore said she still takes a route in the country once a week to collect cans. She also hunts for cans once a week at Lake Wabaunsee and Mission Valley High School.

"I've trucked a big pickup load of cans to Topeka every week for the last four weeks," she said.

In addition to cans, DeVore also collects and sells old batteries, scrap aluminum, brass and copper. Plus, she sells jam and jelly and organizes food sales all in an effort to improve the Eskridge community.

DeVore's hard work and dedication paid off last June when she was awarded the Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis Award for the greatest public service benefiting local communities. The ceremony took place in Washington, D.C.

"I couldn't believe it when I found out I had won," DeVore said. "I never really dreamed that I would win. This was a really wonderful thing to have happen to me at my age, and I never dreamed it was possible."

DeVore's story has been recognized in magazines, newspapers and TV programs nationwide. She even said people from out of state stop by and leave cans for her.

DeVore recalled some individuals from Platte City, Mo., who stopped by one evening when she wasn't home and left some cans.

"You never know when, where or who they will come from," DeVore said.

DeVore's story was brought to campus in hopes of encouraging students to take part in community service projects.

Chad Cleary, junior in history and president of NRHH, said the organization decided to bring DeVore to campus so K-State students could hear her motivational story.

"Here's a lady that started at 50 years of age doing something that people thought was impossible," Cleary said. "She stuck with her dream, and she did it. This proves that dreams are possible."

Cleary said he was amazed at how humble DeVore was with her story.

"Maise acted as if 35 years was nothing," Cleary said. "She is a very down-to-earth person, and she's very real. She has an important message for students to hear."

Students find ways to get out of speeding tickets

Police officers say sweet-talking not best solution

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jesse Ehlen knows all about getting out of speeding tickets. In fact, Ehlen, junior in marketing, has not only gotten out of one ticket, but three of them—all in just two years. While he doesn't necessarily consider himself a professional in the art of escaping police fines, he does feel pretty confident when the red lights from a police car begin flashing in his rearview mirror. "Most of the time, the cops are more lenient when you are polite, to the point and don't make too many excuses or are overly regretful for speeding and getting pulled over," he said. "If you can make up a good reason for why you were in a hurry, that helps, too." Ehlen used plenty of excuses the last time he got pulled over, when he was on his way to Iowa to meet his family. "I was going through a construction zone in Missouri, and a cop pulled me over," he said. "I told him I was meeting my mom and I didn't want her to worry. He basically told me to slow down, take it easy and even offered to call the hotel in Iowa where my parents were staying and seeing if my mom had checked in yet." Lt. Michael Quintenar of the Riley County Police Department said people try to talk their way out of tickets all the time, and depending on the officer, some get away from paying the price. He said it is also the officer's decision to issue a speeding ticket, and many officers take into account the location where the driver is speeding. "It's up to the discretion of the officer whether or not they will issue out a speeding ticket," he said. "It also depends on where the driver is speeding. If they are going five miles over the speed limit in heavy traffic where an accident may occur, chances are they are going to be cited. But, you can also see people going 10 miles over on the highway, and the officer will let them go." Holly Cribbs, sophomore in family and consumer science education, found herself in the wrong place at the wrong time last year, when she was pulled over by an officer on her way back to Manhattan after a weekend trip home. "I was in a speed reduction area where I usually slow down, but this time I didn't," she said. In a matter of minutes, Cribbs and her friend were pulled to the side of a road.

"The cop pulled us over and gave us a lecture about going too fast," she said. "He stood in between our vehicles for 10 minutes, and that entire time I was freaking out." Unlike Ehlen, Cribbs had no idea of what to do as the police officer observed her driver's license and plate tag. "I had no game plan at all," she said. "I always thought if I would get pulled over, I would start crying, but I didn't at all. I was just really polite." Cribbs was able to drive away from the site with just a warning and a lesson learned. "I don't speed very much at all anymore," she said. While some students feel that sweet-talking officers will get them out of a speeding ticket, Lt. Quintenar said there is a better alternative. "Speeding is considered anything over the posted speed limit," he said. "Go the speed limit."

U.S. special forces move in to rescue Westerners from threats in West Africa

By Clarni Chonghaile
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

YAMOUSSOUKRO, Ivory Coast — Waving U.S. flags and shouting "Vive la France!" American schoolchildren escaped a rebel-held Ivory Coast city under siege Wednesday, as U.S. special forces and French troops moved in to rescue Westerners caught in the West African nation's bloodiest uprising. The evacuation came amid concerns that a full-scale battle could envelop Bouake, a central city of a half-million residents. "We're running out of everything," said one frightened Ivorian woman, reached by telephone. "We are scared." U.S. and French troops moved into Bouake Wednesday to safeguard Westerners caught in a six-day uprising after a failed coup Sept. 19 in which at least 270 people died. With insurgents holed up in Bouake and the northern city of Korhogo, President Laurent Gbagbo has pledged an all-out battle to root out rebels in what was once West Africa's most stable and prosperous country. The 191 Americans evacuated from the school were escorted by the French military to an airfield in Yamoussoukro, where U.S. C-130 airplanes will fly them to Ghana this morning, Pentagon officials said. U.S. special forces spilled out of two C-130 cargo planes that touched down in Ivory Coast at mid-afternoon from a staging point in neighboring Ghana. Plane ramps came down, and U.S. forces secured the tarmac of the forest-lined airstrip in Yamoussoukro, clearing the way for Humvees that came rolling out. American soldiers marching with duffel bags and metal boxes rapidly set up a post at the strip, a base for French troops who arrived earlier to move in on behalf of Yamoussoukro's foreigners. American officials would not say what the soldiers were going to do next. About 300 Americans live in Bouake, Ivory Coast's second-largest city, which has been cut off from water, electricity and food since last week's rebel takeover.

TO THE POINT Online sources not an excuse for hard work

Modern language professors' decisions to stop the use of online translators should be a reminder that students shouldn't abuse the Internet when completing assignments.

All students, regardless of their major, are subject to the Honor Code. Allowing Internet sources to supply all the answers is unethical.

The World Wide Web should be used as a learning tool. English professors might be the biggest sticklers when it comes to the golden rule of writing: cite all sources.

Using online translators to complete a foreign language assignment is effective if it is used as a guide. Modern language professors said they have seen the quality of education students receive decline when they use these translators.

Professors and students should embrace the policy that some instructors are implementing, which require that students sign a statement saying they will not use these online translators. This process ensures a certain level of honesty and educational integrity for which this university is known.

Take advantage of the resources available online, but keep in mind the consequences of nearing the line of abuse.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

PLASTIC YOUTH

Trend toward cosmetic surgery among teenagers disturbing

"The soul is born old but grows young. That is the comedy of life. The body is born young and grows old. That is life's tragedy."

It seems many of us aren't buying into Oscar Wilde's idea of misfortune.

Growing older is a constant, but our attitude toward it is changing.

Apparently, the way we combat aging is changing as well. There are battalions of botox and legions of liposuction all awaiting orders to seek and destroy maturing bodies.

At 21, I needn't worry about cosmetic surgery.

Sadly, I am part of a dwindling majority.

Last year alone, more than 65,000 teenagers aged 18 or younger underwent plastic surgery, according to www.plasticsurgery.org.

The most common procedures for this age group were ear surgery, nose reshaping, breast augmentation and liposuction. Though I assume most of the ear surgery and half of the nose reshaping was reconstructive surgery, the abundance disturbs me.

The young don't realize their bodies are developing. Maybe it worries them. It's devastating when you realize you'll never be a size 6 again.

There is a surging number of young women preventing their curves from developing by tucking and sucking away the fat from their stomach and thighs. Shows such as MTV's "Real Life" chronicle the plastic surgery junkies and aesthetically obsessed.

Young women are not the only victims of such vanity. With procedures such as calf implants, men are opting to enhance their appearances as well.

It's safe to assume much of our insecurities are rooted in the images we receive from Hollywood that assert a size 2 frame, a bleached-tooth smile, large eyes and large bust is the American ideal.

Unfortunately, this skewed perception of beauty extends beyond our borders.

In South Korea, girls as young as 14 are undergoing procedures to enlarge their eyes. The wide-eyed effect is created by a small incision made above the eye to produce an artificial double lid. The cost, as mentioned on www.time.com, is usually about $800.

Many parents give such surgeries as graduation presents.

Park Sang Mi, a South Korean girl who chose to enlarge her eyes, states, "Now I know nobody will laugh at me for being ugly."

Beauty depends on more than a skin fold.

These drastic measures taken by youth are just the first steps in life-long maintenance. Plastic surgery is addictive.

The 65,000 who start before age 18 are no doubt in the ranks of the 440,000 who continue to "enhance" their looks when aged 19 to 34.

Instead of listening to our insecurities, it's best to listen to that "old soul" we as youth possess.

Your bank account and your nerve endings will thank you.

Few good TV channels exist; today's shows content with rehashing past

Television sitcoms and cheap TV dramas make people stupid. All the popular shows are just a rehash of what has already been made. The sitcoms seem to date themselves more all the time.

It's the same fake, rude, trite and fickle dialogue it has been for years. I think we can do better than this, America.

It's really bad when mainstream media tries to imitate a specific ideal in our society. Then it takes that ideal, whatever it may be, and pursues it so heavily it loses its original meaning.

You've got to realize the people making these shows are so far out of touch with our dynamic American culture that they rely upon stereotypes to relate with the audience. When MTV shows a busload of tools and fatheads cruising all over the country acting like a bunch of ninies, kids who watch those shows are going to try to assume those roles.

Hence, they become the least common denominator the show already used to make an example. It's a never-ending cycle of stupidity.

"Reality" shows have really got to take a hike. The sooner, the better. How about "The Real World"? You want to see a 25-year-old loser have a bawling fit because someone didn't pamper her every need?

You don't need "The Real World." You need high school. And does America absolutely need three versions of "Law and Order," five medical dramas and eight reality-based shows? Heck no! America needs Shakespeare and opera.

We're into our fifth "Survivor." I was dry-heaving before the first one even started.

I have a problem with CBS and how it's using Ken Stafford of the 79th Precinct NYPD to sell "Survivor: Thailand." Have some taste, please. I mean really, his luxury item is his NYPD shield.

In regards to network television and most of cable, Joe Elkinton, Mr. Goodcents general manager and Gemini, said, "It seems like TV is really geared towards uneducated, stupid people. You've got to sort through so much garbage to actually find anything that has thick intellectual value."

Joe is right. I agree with Joe. I wish I could get only the shows I really want instead of wasting what will add up to thousands of hours flipping through too many channels trying to decide what I should view. Here is a short list of what is actually worth paying for and reasons why.

1. VH1 especially "Behind the Music." This is quite possibly one of the greatest shows available. Check it out.

2. The Learning Channel, Discovery Channel and The History Channel - we really have much to gain from the shows these channels produce. Where else can you see Junkyard Wars and find out who killed King Tut all at once?

3. Comedy Central is absolutely necessary for stand-up comedy, "Saturday Night Live" reruns and "South Park."

4. HBO or AMC. Bottom line - these channels are the most.

5. Fox, in honor of Homer Simpson and Hank Hill.

Everything else is unneeded. Of course, you've got your occasional good episode of Everybody Loves Raymond or Cheers. I even catch myself chuckling over some of the old Diff'rent Strokes pranks. But that is not the point. If Oprah becomes a god, or if John Ritter stars in another sitcom, I'm boycotting television for life.

Wait a second, they've both already happened.

See you at Blockbuster.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

At this instant, 20,000 people are having sex, and you're reading the damn paper.

I apologize for my friend farting at the USC game. Believe me, it was as embarrassing for me as it was disgusting for you.

Will someone fix me some hot Jell-O and watch Lifetime movies with me? I miss my mom.

I am a biker-conscious pedestrian. On my way to class, I saw a bike coming up behind me, so I kindly moved onto the grass, and the jerk moved onto the grass and ran into me after all.

I think we could save money by conserving all paper being used for parking tickets. I think my roommate would appreciate that.

I don't know who these so-called rude Putnam guys are, but they're definitely not on fourth floor. So, any girls who want some nice guys to talk to, just come up to fourth floor Putnam.

How is it after three years at K-State, my dad not only body-surfed before me, but got in the Fourum for it? Go figure. Way to go, Dad.

You know those editorials in English and Spanish really bug me. We speak English in this country, not Spanish.

My mom is hotter than your mom.

Sexy ladies, I'm taking applications.

No way, dude. My mom's way hotter.

I am the guy with the big, red 'fro. If you were talking about me in the Fourum, then let me know. My shirt has a smiley face, and people I don't know like to touch my 'fro.

Has anybody else ever wondered why the Campus Fourum is spelled F-O-U-R-U-M?

Paul White: Give me back my $16.

I'm really attracted to this guy named Mike. He's in my honors class, but knowing my luck, he's probably in a frat.

I just had to file a restraining order against my ex-girlfriend. I'm pretty sure she's crazy.

So 80 percent are sexually active? Go, sex ed.

I have a journalism professor who is liberal out the wazoo, and he's about the most close-minded person I've ever met.

If you ever get caught picking your nose in class, you should just tell them you're pointing at your brain.

I like bald men.

Stop bashing on Johnson County, or I'll have my dad fire your dad.

This is the guy farting in the student section at the game Saturday. Thanks for the appreciation.

What do the letters designating parking lots stand for?

If I pick up after my roommate, is it wrong to ask him to do the dishes and take out the trash?

Wow. They really did change the opening announcement. Cool.

I saw this girl beside Cardwell, and I asked her, "How's business," and she said, "None of yours."

For those who called in about the warm-up music: Hey, we are all still in the '80s? Get out of it. Figure it out.

Thank you, readers' Fourum. All of your witty advice about how to get girls has finally paid off. I scored last night.

To all who wanted to know: If you try to call the Fourum with your nose, it's not going to happen.

To all the students in Biology 198: This whole responding to the listserv business is getting out of hand. Stop it.

I just had sex.

I just had sex, too.

My computer just broke. Where's MacGuyver when you need him?

Today is the first day of the rest of your life, and that says something.

Where are all the left-handed desks?

To whoever picked up my No Effects hooded sweatshirt in Justin 109: Please turn it in.

I told this girl a compliment, and she told me it made her melt. Is that good?

"Seventh Heaven" was recently named the top-viewed show among college students.

What's with all this "I agree with Joe" stuff?

Evolution was obviously created by people who don't believe in the Bible.

Paul White insulted the Fourum. The only way he can redeem himself is to cut himself a mullet.

For the person who stole my Darwin fish off my car yesterday: I hope you never get the grease off your hands.

Award-winning anchor to deliver lecture

Kansas journalist to speak as part of Huck Boyd series

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A&E Network anchor Bill Kurtis will come back to his Kansas roots Sept. 26 to deliver the third-annual Huck Boyd Lecture in Community Media.

Kurtis, the anchor of A&E's Emmy-award winning series "Investigative Reports," will return to his home state for the lecture, which will be at 1:30 p.m. today at Forum Hall in the K-State Student Union.

Gloria Freeland, assistant professor of journalism and director of the Huck Boyd National Center for Community Media, said Kurtis was invited to speak for several reasons.

"He is a good choice because he is from Kansas and because of his background in journalism," she said. "He is also part owner of some Kansas papers."

Kurtis graduated from the University of Kansas and then began his career as a news reporter for WIBW-TV in Topeka.

He also attended Washburn University's School of Law before moving to Chicago and then to Los Angeles as a reporter.

He has anchored the "CBS Morning News" in New York and also founded Kurtis Productions in 1990. He anchors several series on A&E including "Investigative Reports," "American Justice" and "The New Explorers."

The Huck Boyd lecture series was formed to commemorate McDill "Huck" Boyd, a Kansas journalist and politician who supported both community service and community journalism.

Freeland said Boyd wanted to give visibility to small town media because of its importance to the community it serves. She said Kurtis represents Boyd's philosophy because of his ownership of small Kansas media outlets and his interest in developing land in Kansas.

The first Huck Boyd lecture was delivered by Bob Dole, a former U.S. senator from Kansas and Republican presidential candidate, in 1999. The second lecture was delivered by former U.S. senator from Illinois, Paul Simon, in 2001. Freeland said Kurtis' speech will be different from the previous two because the political element will not be present.

"The first two were political and well-known figures," she said.

"They were a good start for the series. Bill Kurtis is also well-known, but the fact that he is a journalist will make it different."

Freeland said Kurtis' lecture topic has not been announced, but she is expecting him to relate his journalistic experiences to his roots in Kansas.

"He grew up in Kansas and has compared the Kansas prairie to Africa and the Sarengeti during his reports," she said.

"The older I get, the more amazed I become with how connected people are."

House approves $8.6 billion payment of back dues to United Nations

By Ken Guggenheim
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — With the United States seeking support for possible military action against Iraq, the House voted Wednesday to make the final payment on back dues to the United Nations.

The dues payment is part of an $8.6 billion bill authorizing State Department programs for next year. An additional $5.2 billion was authorized for counterterrorism and military aid to U.S. allies. The bill was approved by voice vote.

The bill authorizes payment of $244 million to the United Nations, the final part of the $926 million in back dues the United States agreed to pay in 1999. In exchange, the United Nations agreed to reform its bureaucracy and reduce the United States' financial obligations.

Last year, the House voted to withhold the $244 million payment after the United States lost its seat on the U.N. Human Rights Commission. It recovered the seat this year.

In addition to the back dues, the House bill included $78 million in new obligations.

With the House vote Wednesday, Congress is poised to approve its first State Department authorization bill since 1994. The bill offers funding guidelines for dozens of foreign relations programs, although the actual spending will be determined in a separate appropriations bill.

Traditionally, Congress approves an authorization bill every two years. But in recent years, Congress had been unable to work out a bill, partly because of differences over whether U.S. aid could be used for overseas family planning agencies that use their own money to discuss abortion with clients. Congress has had to waive the authorization requirement or include it in the appropriations bill.

This year's bill offered few points of contention. House-

Senate negotiators were able to work out a final bill on Monday that didn't address the abortion debate.

In one area of disagreement, negotiators were unable to agree on the funding and scope of public diplomacy programs to boost the U.S. image abroad.

They will try to resolve those differences in a separate bill, congressional aides said.

Changes in the bill appear to give the Bush administration more flexibility in setting the criteria for judging nations. Because the administration has criticized the certification program, some lawmakers believe weaker standards will prevail.

YOUNG LEADERSHIP

With no returning seniors to guide men's golf team, 2 juniors push young Cats

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

On a Wildcat team that has no seniors, juniors A.J. Elgert and Aaron Watkins have found themselves in a leadership role on a team that has tied for third place in its first two tournaments.

"It hasn't been that hard because the team chemistry is so good," Watkins said. "We have a young team this year, so they are trying to get into the groove of things. They're not used to traveling and keeping up with academics."

"Things are progressing well," he said. "We're getting a lot more consistent."

After the Cats finished third in both the Fairway Club Invitational in Lincoln, Neb., and the Inverness Invitational in Toledo, Ohio, Elgert said his new leadership role hasn't been a problem.

"I'm not the type of person who's going to stand up and preach in front of people," he said. "I like to just go out there and play. Hopefully they will just follow my lead."

A native of Lincoln, Elgert hoped to do better than his 17th place finish in the Fairway Club Invitational.

He said, however, he was happy with the team's overall performance in Nebraska.

"The first event in Nebraska, I was a little bit disappointed in my performance. But at the same time, it's a top 20 finish. I didn't win, but the team did well. We're off to a good start," Elgert said. "I just wasn't very sharp. I didn't play bad, I just didn't play really well. My game wasn't there. That's golf."

The same can be said for Watkins.

Watkins struggled with his consistency in the first event of the season, shooting a 4-over-par 78 in the final round to finish in a tie for eighth place.

He said playing a more consistent game is his main goal this season.

"I'm starting to do that a little more," he said. "I need to keep my patience. I have a tendency to get ahead of myself and think too much."

Watkins said he has been able to keep his anger under control throughout the first two events, something the average golfer would love to do.

"I haven't been getting angry," he said. "My patience is good. Good things are going to happen eventually. My outlook is a little more positive."

Elgert also struggled with consistency at the Inverness Invitational where he tied for 16th place.

"In Toledo, I had one bad round," he said. "Other than that, as far as I know, I was in second place. It was the strongest field I've ever played in. I was very pleased with that performance."

The Inverness Club has hosted four U.S. Opens, one U.S. Amateur, two PGA Championships and will host the 2003 U.S. Senior Open. Elgert said it was the toughest and most challenging course he has seen.

"It is by far the greatest facility I've played on," he said. "You read about these tournaments that have hosted majors and you watch them on television, but when you get out there, everything is just perfect. It's ridiculous, the level of play that is required to play these golf courses."

After competing in the 2002 U.S. Amateur, Watkins said he knew the course would be hard, but it still provided him with a challenge.

"That course is definitely hard," Watkins said. "I played in the U.S. Amateur this year and the two courses just about go head-to-head. It was a good experience."

The most positive thing Elgert took from the Inverness Invitational, he said, was the way the young K-State team competed.

"It makes me feel great that our program has come to the level that we can go out there and play these courses," Elgert said.

Cats avenge last season's performance in Iowa, sweep Cyclones

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State volleyball had a bitter taste lingering in its mouth when the team traveled to Des Moines, Iowa, on Wednesday night.

Last year, K-State dropped the first of 40 games to the Cyclones, a streak dating back to 1996.

Although the Cats had won 12 in a row over Iowa State going into Wednesday night's match, they wanted to make more of a statement this time around.

They did. The Cats (6-5, 2-1) breezed past the Cyclones 30-25, 30-24, 31-29 Wednesday, claiming their second straight Big 12 win.

Senior outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said it was good to wrap up a little unfinished business from last year.

"We wanted to come up here and make a statement," she said. "We didn't want to go four like we did last year, and we knew they would be a better team."

The Cyclones definitely were. Iowa State started nearly all freshmen last

Game 1: K-State 30, Iowa State 25
Game 2: K-State 30, Iowa State 24
Game 3: K-State 31, Iowa State 29

year, so they had a year of intense experience in the Big 12 to get better, Pollard said.

See VOLLEYBALL Page 12

K-State system seems smart now; Big 12 schools still looking for QB talent

Four games into the 2002 season and the Cats are left pondering the same things they were one year ago.

Quarterbacks and kickers.

But, never fear newcomers to the bandwagon, this year those problems won't be the Cats' downfall. In fact, they will be their strength.

Just have a look around the Big 12. Last week, ESPN reported that the backup Oklahoma quarterback would be out for several weeks due to a concussion. Apparently, this Sooner fell out of the back of a moving pickup.

The "injury" left the Sooners with only two healthy quarterbacks, including a true freshman who had to give up his redshirt.

And you thought K-State had some brainless quarterbacks.

At Colorado, starting QB Craig Ochs dropped out of school this week in hopes of receiving a medical redshirt.

Left to lead the Buffalo's offense? Only backup junior college transfer Robert Hodge.

Kansas coach Mark Mangino chased away the Jayhawks' 2001 starting signal caller, Mario Kinsey, and is left with two inexperienced quarterbacks.

Nebraska? Jamaal Lord, trying to fill the shoes vacated by Eric Crouch, is not even coming close.

What I am trying to get at is that what is perceived as a weakness at K-State — our constantly changing quarterback situation — is actually far from that.

The Cats have two highly touted quarterbacks who each have seen plenty of playing time. Both have the ability — granted, it's buried deep down — to be very good quarterbacks.

Which one could be better? Well, I think we saw the answer on Saturday. Eli Roberson shocked even me with his second quarter entrance, and then dominance.

I will admit, I gave up on Roberson. When Marc Dunn was declared the starter, I left Roberson for dead, and figured that we'd heard the last of him. But I was wrong. And I won't give up on him again.

Eli Roberson should be the starter, and I'm never changing my mind.

The man just brings too much to K-State's offense to leave him sitting on the bench.

In the first three games of the season, we saw how Marc Dunn could throw the ball. He delivered strikes with pinpoint accuracy to receivers breaking for the deep ball.

But against a more talented defense, that skill was kept in check. With Dunn in the game, it was just too easy for USC to guess what the Cats would do.

The only other weapon left on the field was Darren Sproles. Unfortunately, when a top defense like USC's decides to stop one running back, they are able to do so, and then even Sproles was neutralized.

NBA | Jordan's announcement expected

Reiterating what he first announced a year ago, Michael Jordan is expected to issue a statement later this week confirming he will play a 15th NBA season.

Jordan signed a two-year contract with the Washington Wizards when he ended his second retirement. Despite missing 22 games with knee problems last season, he said he planned to fulfill the contract if he felt physically able.

Jordan has said he would make a "last-minute" announcement about his playing status. The Wizards open training camp next Tuesday in Wilmington, N.C.

NFL | Moss released from jail

Randy Moss walked out of jail whistling, charged with two misdemeanors instead of a possible felony for allegedly pushing a traffic officer a half-block with his car.

The Minnesota Vikings' star receiver won't even miss a game.

Moss was released Wednesday from the Hennepin County jail after spending the night. He was charged with careless driving and failure to obey a traffic officer.

Police said they found a small quantity of marijuana in Moss' car, an amount that would qualify as a petty misdemeanor, but no charge was immediately filed.

Moss, who has a history of trouble on and off the field, had been arrested on suspicion of assault with a dangerous weapon, a felony.

He whistled as he left jail and walked through a pack of reporters.

"You'll hear my side later," Moss said. "I was treated bad."

NFL | Faulk practices

Marshall Faulk practiced with the St. Louis Rams on Wednesday, a sign that he could be ready to face the Dallas Cowboys on Sunday.

The team, which will be trying to end an 0-3 start, didn't have any immediate news on results of an exam on Faulk's strained neck, however.

Before practice, coach Mike Martz said he was hopeful team doctors would clear Faulk.

Faulk, who was injured when upended by the Buc's Derrick Brooks in the second quarter of Monday night's 26-14 loss in Tampa Bay, was scheduled to undergo the exam Wednesday. It had been scheduled for Tuesday.

K.C. Idol

Student competes for shot at spot in national spotlight

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every musician works, dreaming of catching a break and making it into the big times.

Sarah Callaghan, junior in humanities, will be trying to hit it big today. She will compete with 14 semi-finalists in Kansas City's KCHZ-FM 95.7 "KC Idol."

"Some of my friends from KC told me about it, so I figured I'd give it a shot," Callaghan said. "I didn't think that I had much of a chance due to the fact that there were so many people there. The line was so long that it went down the hall to the elevator, then down and out around the building. Overall, I bet we waited for at least four hours."

The contest is a regional version of the hit TV show "American Idol." More than 300 musicians participated to win a trip to Los Angeles to try out for the "American Idol" show.

The winner will have five hours of recording time at Chapman Studios, of Kansas City, Mo. Jewel and Tech N9ne are among the various artists to have recorded material at the studios. The winner will also receive air play of on Z95.7. Callaghan will be singing live on the radio between 7-8 a.m.

The finalists will be selected by the results from online voting due to listeners' support. Voting is available at www.z957.net.

With her background, Callaghan just might be the one to walk away with the grand prize.

"I come from a very musical environment," she said. "I've always been pretty musical. My great-grandma still plays her guitar. I've played piano and the guitar for years. Also, I've sang in the band Joe Fund, as well as quite a few fairs."

Sheryl Crow and Janis Joplin top off Callaghan's list of main musical influences, but she finds particular inspiration in Michelle Branch. In fact, she describes her own music as somewhat similar to Branch's. Similar not just because of the sound, but because Callaghan not only plays the guitar and sings, she also has written several songs of her own.

"I've really gotten serious about writing my own music the past year and a half or so," she said. "I've got about 12 original songs I've written on my own. In fact, one of them I used for my audition. It's called 'Wake Up.'"

Callaghan said she was surprised she was allowed to play for more than a minute when she was in the studio performing for the contest.

"They were cutting people after about 10 seconds into their songs because there were so many people there," Callaghan said. "That made me really nervous because they were axing all of these people so quick."

"But my friend got me pumped up and I went in and started playing, and they let me play for quite a while, which made me feel pretty good about the situation."

But she didn't feel so great about the bittersweet awakening she received the next morning.

"They called and woke me up really early in the morning," she said. "And Twiggy (part of the on-air staff), was on the other line and said, 'We're going to put you on the air in a second! And they put me on hold along with other musicians for like five minutes.'"

She taught herself to play during her freshman year of college.

"They came back and congratulated us and told us we were semifinalists. Then they talked to me first and made me sing after being awake for 10 minutes."

The idea for KC Idol came from the success of the TV show "American Idol." With the target audience of Z95.7 being the same age as "American Idol" contestants, it seemed to be a good fit, John Groves, assistant promotions director of the station, said.

"It seemed to be that our core audience found 'American Idol' to be a big hit," Groves said. "It seemed that our audience matched the demographic of the 'American Idol' audience. And we figured that it would be a great promotion for local artists."

"They will have quite a bit of recognition by getting air play as well as the fact that there will probably be a few record label reps in the audience."

The contest differs from "American Idol" because it has no age limit, and contestants are allowed to play guitar or have a musical background, Groves said.

If Callaghan is selected as one of the 10 finalists, she will compete live Sept. 29 at the Beaumont Club in Kansas City, Mo. A panel of judges will be grading acts on five basic criteria: vocal quality, image and style, stage presence, crowd response and the overall performance.

Callaghan might have a slight edge because she has a guitar, she said.

"I'm not sure exactly how it will all go," she said. "But I know I'll try my best. At the very least, I know that out of all those people, I was probably the only chick with a guitar."

Mandolin quartet to mix instrumental styles in McCain performance

Bluegrass, Latin, classical featured in string concert

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mixing classical, Latin and bluegrass, the Modern Mandolin Quartet, formed in 1985, brings new sounds to the mandolin.

All the instruments in the quartet require picks instead of bows, which is something that founding member Dana Rath said he enjoys about the sound.

"Sometimes with a bowed string instrument, the melodies don't come across as clear as they do with plucked strings," he said.

"I think I hear with mandolin ears now. I think about how different compositions would sound on mandolins.

"We discover ways to give compositions a fresh sound. You may have heard a piece before, but you haven't heard it this way."

Rath plays mandolin, as does Matt Flinner, the most recent addition to the group.

Paul Binkley, another founding member, plays the mandola, a mid-range, larger version of the mandolin. Gyan Riley plays the mandocello, a low-end mandolin that fulfills the same part as a cello in a string quartet.

Thom Jackson, marketing and promotions director for McCain, said the group plays a variety of styles that show off the unexpected versatility of the instrument.

The group visited Wamego Middle School and Seven Dolors Grade School on Wednesday, and will play at Anthony Middle School and Eisenhower Middle School today to educate students about the music.

Rath said he formed the group because he was interested in hearing a string quartet style done with mandolins, and he wanted to create a new kind of repertoire for the instrument. The group has now released five recordings and been featured on various compilations.

Rath, who has studied classical guitar and played in bluegrass bands, said all the members have other projects in other genres.

In fact, the most recent addition to the band, Flinner, won the national banjo contest in Winfield, Kan., in 1990.

Flinner has played several times at the well-known annual music festival in Kansas, and joined the group four months ago on the recommendation of a former member.

"I've been a fan of theirs for a long time," he said. "I know the original first mandolin player, Mike Marshall, and he recommended me when he left. At the time it didn't work out, and they had a few other players, but now I'm able to play with the group and it's great."

Flinner said he had to learn plenty of new material for the group, and it feels good to play with musicians he has admired for so long.

Rath has tried other things but said the group intrigues him because he enjoys the interaction between experienced musicians.

"This quartet project is something Paul and I have been doing for a long time," he said.

"I like doing it because there is still a lot to be discovered about it that hasn't been discovered yet. Plus mandolins just have a great sound."

"Lord of the Rings" trailer goes online
NEW YORK — The trailer for "The Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers" will premiere Monday on America Online.

Starting at 12:01 a.m., fans can download images for the second film in the adaptation of J.R.R. Tolkien's fantasy trilogy. A day later, the trailer will appear on the movie's Web site.

The film, which reunites Elijah Wood, Sean Astin, Ian McKellen, Cate Blanchett and the rest of the cast from "The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring," is due in theaters Dec. 18. The trailer will start appearing in North American theaters on Oct. 4 and will go worldwide throughout the month.

The third film, "The Return of the King," is scheduled to come out in December 2003. All three movies were shot simultaneously.

Dallas cuts funding for film commission

DALLAS — The city that was the setting for J.R. Ewing's fictional oil empire has cut funding to a regional film commission that had supported movie and television projects.

The Dallas-Fort Worth Regional Film Commission is a victim of the city's $95 million budget shortfall.

During Burke's tenure, films such as "Born on the Fourth of July," "JFK" and "Bottle Rocket," and TV shows including "Dallas," "Barney & Friends," "Wishbone" and "Walker, Texas Ranger," were shot in the city and the surrounding area.

LISTENING BOOTH

The Collegian wants to know what music you are listening to. If you are passionate about music and want to express your opinion, e-mail A&E Editor JJ Duncan at jduncan\_80@hotmail.com. This week we asked Andrew Sellers, sophomore in industrial engineering, what he's playing. What five albums are you listening to and why?

1. Dredg: "Leitmotif"

This is some of the most beautiful and emotional music I've ever heard. It is a concept album that has as much to do with art as it does with the music. It mixes tribal rhythms, pummeling guitar riffs with intricate acoustic interludes, and heartfelt vocals with inspiring lyrics.

2. Pulse Ultra: "Headspace"

It's atmospheric metal at its best. It features chugging, Tool-inspired riffs interwoven with spacey, effect-laden guitars, and a singer with a strong sense of melody. They use all sorts of crazy time signatures, and their song structures are very progressive.

3. Trey Anastasio: "Trey Anastasio"

Trey's solo album is a little more ambitious than the Phish albums. He uses an eight-piece horn section that gives the music a funky, jazzy feel. His voice is so peaceful, and his music always puts me in a good mood.

4. Sarah McLachlan: "Fumbling Towards Ecstasy"

I love female songwriters like Bjork and Tori Amos, but I think Sarah McLachlan is probably my favorite of all of them. Her voice and melodies are dreamy, and the music is laid back. It's an awesome album just to chill to, do homework to, or fall asleep to.

5. Tool: "Salival"

These guys amaze me with every record they put out. They are unlike any other band. Maynard has a beautiful, almost feminine, singing voice. They are one of the few bands that know how to do a cover song the right way, by playing new versions of "No Quarter" by Led Zeppelin and a Peach song.

House passes bill against abortion payoffs

Hospitals, insurance companies to benefit from new Congress measure

By Janelle Carter
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The House passed a bill Wednesday that would let hospitals and insurance companies refuse to perform or pay for abortions without forfeiting Medicare and other federal funding.

Anti-abortion activists hailed the 229-189 vote as a key action that would shield Catholic hospitals and other health providers that oppose abortion.

Supporters of abortion rights accused conservatives of attempting to scale back women's access to the procedure.

The debate provoked strong emotions among lawmakers.

"The question before us is not the question of abortion," said Rep. Todd Akin, R-Mo. "The question is whether we protect the various health care organizations, whether we want to protect their right to have a choice, to even have an opinion."

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, D-N.Y., countered by saying the bill isn't about religious freedom or protecting the right of conscience, but it is only about making it harder for women.

The Bush administration earlier in the day offered its support.

"Hospitals and health care professionals should not be forced to perform or participate in abortions," the Bush administration said in a statement Wednesday.

"This legislation makes clear that they may not be subjected to discrimination by the federal government, or by any state or local government ... because they oppose or choose not to participate in abortions or abortion training."

It is unlikely the measure will win enough support for passage in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

Supporters have maintained the bill is necessary to clarify entities covered by a conscience clause in current law.

Two Democrats from Ohio, Marcy Kaptur and Dennis Kucinich, voted "present" on the bill.

The Alaska Supreme Court in 1997 ruled that a hospital in Palmer, Alaska, must allow doctors to perform abortions.

The court said in its ruling that the Valley Hospital, which had adopted an anti-abortion policy, qualified as a "quasi-public" entity because it received money, land and operating funds from state, local and federal governments.

Wednesday's bill would allow health providers and insurers to refuse to perform, pay for, counsel or refer patients for abortion services.

The vote was just the latest abortion debate waged in the House. In July, Republicans pushed through a ban on the late-term procedure known by opponents as partial birth abortion.

Lawmakers have also passed a bill to make it a federal crime to transport a minor across state lines for an abortion to circumvent parental consent laws.

The abortion debate has spilled over into other areas of House business. House Majority Leader Dick Armey, a staunch abortion foe, refused to allow the House to consider a bill reauthorizing community health centers until lawmakers took up the abortion bill passed Wednesday.

Bush to send envoy to North Korea

Discussions reopened for 1st time since Clinton administration

By George Gedda
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush plans to send an envoy to North Korea in the near future, reopening security talks with that country for the first time in almost two years, the White House said Wednesday.

President Bush notified South Korean President Kim Dae-jung of his decision in a telephone call, presidential press secretary Ari Fleischer said.

"The two leaders agreed that real progress with the North depends on full resolution of the security issues on the Korean Peninsula, including the North's possession and pursuit of weapons of mass destruction and ballistic missiles," Fleischer said.

The announcement came after U.S. and North Korean officials held two rounds of talks earlier this week about sending an envoy.

A senior administration official, asking not to be identified, said Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly was likely to undertake the mission.

Kelly was supposed to have traveled to North Korea in July but the visit was postponed, partly because a June 19 gun battle at sea between ships of North and South Korea had soured the atmosphere.

Secretary of State Colin Powell chatted informally with North Korean Foreign Minister Paek Nam-sun at a meeting of Asia-Pacific leaders in Brunei in late July, but no decisions on renewed talks were reached.

Despite Bush's decision to send an envoy, there was little in Fleischer's remarks Wednesday to suggest the president was backing away from his deep suspicion of North Korea.

"Nothing has changed in the president's thinking about North Korea's President Kim Jong Il and the North Korean leader's starvation of his own people, the militarization efforts that he's leading, the massive number of conventional weapons that he has on the border with South Korea, as well as proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," Fleischer said.

At the same time, he noted that Bush had said the United States was prepared to meet with North Korea any time, any place.

He said there could have been progress earlier were it not for the incident at sea in June.

There have been no discussions between the United States and North Korea since late in the Clinton administration.

Madeleine Albright visited Pyongyang in October 2000 for talks on curbing Pyongyang's development and export of missiles. The talks were inconclusive.

In June 2001, Bush proposed resuming talks, but North Korea showed little interest until last spring.

Pyongyang may have been influenced by Bush's designation of North Korea as part of an international "axis of evil" last January.

Last week, Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, after a visit to North Korea, urged Bush in a telephone conversation to "open a road to dialogue" with North Korea.

Leaders postpone vote on federal agencies

Angry conservatives lead Congress in stop

By Alan Fram
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Unhappy conservatives on Wednesday forced House leaders to postpone a vote on a bill to keep federal agencies functioning through next week, a measure made necessary by pre-election gridlock over Congress' budget work.

With the government's new fiscal year starting next Tuesday, lawmakers have yet to complete any of the 13 annual measures that finance federal operations. The short-term bill would keep agencies open through Oct. 4, and was expected to pass easily the House and Senate this week.

But conservatives led by House Budget Committee Chairman Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, refused to let the House debate the measure, which had won support from other Republicans, Democrats and the White House. Nussle declined to comment, but aides said he was worried the bill could allow too much spending, a contention other Republicans rejected.

Despite Nussle's objections, GOP leaders planned a full House debate for Thursday.

President Bush has spent much of the year fighting with congressional Democrats — and some Republicans — over spending. Bush and many Republicans want the spending bills to cost $759 billion or less, while Democrats and some Republicans prefer $768 billion or more. The rest of the $2.1 trillion budget covers automatically paid benefits such as Social Security and Medicare.

Yet amid talk of war with Iraq and the continuing threat of terrorism, neither side has shown any taste for a showdown that escalates into a government shutdown.

The weeklong measure would let the White House hold spending to a rate that, over a year, would be several billion dollars below Bush's $759 billion figure.

The bill contained a provision extending the welfare law through Dec. 31. That law, which provides states with $16.5 billion a year for benefits, job training and other programs, would otherwise expire on Tuesday.

Work on a long-range renewal of the welfare law has moved slowly.

SEC will act against company directors who neglect shareholders' interests

Agency enforcement promises legal action against corporate crime

By Marcy Gordon
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Securities and Exchange Commission will take action against company directors who neglect their duty to protect shareholders against abuses by companies, the agency's enforcement chief said Wednesday.

In Enron's stunning collapse, the company's outside directors were found to have failed in their watchdog duties in two reports: one issued in February by a special Enron committee and a second by a Senate panel in July.

A Senate Governmental Affairs subcommittee found that Enron's directors closed their eyes to evidence the energy-trading company was careening toward financial disaster. Its report concluded that claims by former directors they were kept in the dark were untrue.

The SEC has been pursuing a civil investigation of Enron's accounting practices while the Justice Department has conducted a criminal inquiry.

The SEC's enforcement director, Stephen Cutler, was asked by a reporter whether the agency was pursuing directors of companies embroiled in the recent accounting scandals.

"Let me clear about this," Cutler replied.

"There is no accounting or financial reporting case that we are investigating in which we don't closely scrutinize the conduct of the board of directors, including outside directors. And we will not hesitate to bring enforcement actions against outside directors if they are culpable."

The question was prompted by a report in Wednesday's Wall Street Journal that the SEC had decided not to pursue in the immediate future any enforcement action against Enron's directors.

Referring to the Journal report, SEC Chairman Harvey Pitt said: "Recent press speculation about purported (SEC) decisions with respect to 'forgoing' enforcement actions in connection with ongoing investigations is factually inaccurate and irresponsible."

"We're unaware of any inaccuracies in our story," said Byron Calame, a spokesman for Journal publisher Dow Jones & Co. Inc.

"If the SEC chairman will specify what is 'factually inaccurate' in the story, we will carefully review his specific assertions to determine if a clarification or correction is warranted."

Legal experts acknowledge that it is difficult to make such cases against company directors because of stringent standards of proof under federal law.

"Those are very hard things to prove," David Ruder, a former SEC chairman who teaches law at Northwestern University, said Wednesday.

Besides, he said, with the dozens of big companies it is investigating for accounting problems — including WorldCom, Global Crossing and Adelphia Communications — the SEC "has an enormous number of things on its plate right now."

In its 60-page critique of Enron's directors, the Senate panel said that "much that was wrong with Enron was known to the board."

Attorneys for the company and the directors have disputed the findings. The internal Enron report, led by University of Texas Law School dean William Powers, found that the directors "failed ... in oversight duties."

Lawmakers have said Enron directors approved complex financial arrangements knowing that the company's management freely handed out bonuses — some $50 million for closing a deal for an electric power project in India that subsequently failed, for example.

In addition, many of the directors themselves had conflicts of interest, according to lawmakers who cited consulting contracts worth millions that some of them had with the company and ties they had with charities that received large donations from Enron. SEC will act against company directors who neglect duty, enforcement chief says

The directors — and top Enron executives — have been widely criticized for reaping hundreds of millions of dollars from selling their company stock in 2000 and 2001.

Soldiers move into position to prevent attacks during India religious riots

By Ashok Sharma
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

GANDHINAGAR, India — Soldiers moved into position Wednesday to prevent new religious rioting in western India after gunmen killed 32 people at a Hindu temple. India blamed Pakistan, raising new tensions between the hostile neighbors.

Pakistan said it wasn't connected with the gunmen, who Indian authorities said belonged to a previously unknown group called Tehreek-e-Kasas, or "Movement for Revenge."

Those killed at the Swaminarayan Temple on the outskirts of Gandhinagar included at least one government commando, two policemen and the two attackers. Seventy-four people were wounded, including at least 23 police officers.

There were fears that the allegation against Pakistan, an Islamic nation, could set off attacks against Muslims in the state of Gujarat, where the temple is located.

At least 1,000 people were killed in Gujarat, most of them Muslims slain by Hindus, in riots after Muslims attacked Hindus on a train in February.

Brig. Raj Sitapathy said letters found on the gunmen said they carried out the attack "because they could not tolerate what happened to children, women and Muslims during the Gujarat riots."

Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee visited the temple and called for an end to the violence.

"I have seen blotches of blood here. This blood will dry up, but will leave behind its marks, which will be a challenge to us," he told reporters. "I assure you we will fight terrorism and defeat it together."

The Indian army sent 3,000 soldiers to the state to guard against any new violence.

The Defense Ministry said the troops were requested by the state government, which had been criticized for not acting quickly to quell the rioting earlier this year.

Schools, colleges and businesses stayed shut in Gandhinagar and the nearby commercial capital, Ahmadabad.

The World Hindu Council called for a nationwide general strike Thursday to protest what it called "jihad terrorism."

"The strike is to warn that if the government does not act in time, people will take the law into their own hands," said Mohan Salekar, the group's general secretary.

But Vajpayee said in Gandhinagar: "First there is a violent incident in one place, then there is mindless revenge. We need to end this."

At dawn Wednesday, commandos stormed the temple, killing the two gunmen who had attacked Tuesday evening.

The gunmen eluded government forces for nearly 14 hours, lying quiet for long periods, then returning fire and lobbing grenades, Sitapathy said.

No group claimed responsibility for the attack, and the gunmen were not identified. But India's deputy prime minister, Lal K. Advani, blamed Pakistan.

Advani referred to the Sept. 12 speech that Pakistan's President Pervez Musharraf made to the United Nations, when he condemned the killings of Muslims in Gujarat.

"Our enemy went to the United Nations and spoke about Gujarat," Advani said at the temple. "From that, it appears they had been planning for some time and this attack has been executed to implement their designs."

QUARTERBACK | K-State's quarterbacks give team tough look

But, with Roberson, everything changes.

All of a sudden you have to be aware of where the quarterback is and what he is doing all of the time. Roberson has mastered the option run so that if he even takes a step to the right or left as if he were going to option it, the entire defense has to haul it full speed to the corner to try and stop him.

As for Roberson's mistakes, I don't credit any of the fumbles this weekend to his mishaps. At the end of the first half, he fumbled, giving the Trojans their first touchdown, but it really wasn't his fault. The play call and a missed block left his backside completely open, and a timely blitz by USC exposed that weakness in a hurry.

The other fumble, given up at the 3-yard line as the Wildcats prepared to score and finish off USC once and for all, was nothing but a terrible referee decision. Roberson was clearly down, and should not have been held responsible for the fumble.

If K-State can present a quarterback who can pose a significant option threat, and at the same time have the skills to drill the ball into a receiver 10 or 15 yards downfield, a defense will be left not knowing which way to turn.

That is how K-State beat USC. That, and an incredible defensive performance.

Ell Roberson just brings too much to the field to ignore. At times he makes bonehead decisions, but with Roberson, even three steps forward is worth two steps back.

Without Roberson, our offense lacks dazzle, punch and weapons. With him, the entire field opens up, and there is no end to the Cats' weapons.

I am for Ell.

On the other hand, having two starters might not be a terrible thing. Heaven forbid one of our quarterbacks falls out of the back of a truck, at least we still have another starter.

VOLLEYBALL | Offense clicks in 2nd straight Big 12 shutout win

That experience and improvement showed with ISU up 27-24 in the third game.

"We played back and forth," Pollard said.

"We made some critical errors down the road — we let them have too many points, but we remained composed and hung in there.

"But you have to give some credit to Iowa State. They'll get some teams in the Big 12."

Pollard led the Cats with 13 kills but had a nice supporting cast of Lauren Goehring and Cari Jensen — each recording 12 kills in the win.

K-State also had seven aces, many at critical times.

Coach Suzie Fritz said her team did many things well.

"We passed well enough where we could distribute the ball," she said. "That was nice because that gave everyone a chance to get their swings."

The Cats were at 68 percent perfect passing for the night. Fritz said that was encouraging for her to see. The team goal is to pass at 60 percent perfect passing each match.

"We passed the ball just extremely well," Fritz said. "That's as good as it has been all year."

With a win at Baylor last week, and now one over Iowa State, the Cats are gaining some confidence, Fritz said.

"Anytime you can win on the road, it's wonderful," she said. "It's just a hard thing to do."

ISRAEL | Palestinians end talks without Arafat to lead discussion

U.S., Europe and the Arab world to pull back.

One consequence of the siege is a halt to efforts to reform Arafat's regime, said a top official, Mahmoud Abbas. Abbas, also known as Abu Mazen, is Arafat's deputy and has been mentioned as a possible prime minister if the Palestinians decide to appoint one to take over some of Arafat's duties in the framework of reforms.

But Abbas said there can be no talk of reforms "while our president is under such cruel and unprecedented aggression." Abbas told The Associated Press that he has been meeting with other reform-minded Palestinians, but they have discussed only how to end Israel's siege.

Israel, Europe and the United States have joined many Palestinians in demanding reforms in Arafat's unwieldy and corrupt regime.

Israel sent tanks and bulldozers into Arafat's compound last Thursday after a Palestinian suicide bomber blew up a Tel Aviv bus, killing himself and six other people.

On Monday, the U.N. Security Council passed a resolution demanding that Israel end the siege, pull its forces back toward the lines they held before violence erupted two years ago, while condemning attacks on civilians and calling on the Palestinians to put those responsible for terror attacks on trial.

Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Israel cannot carry out the resolution "because the other part will not be fulfilled," charging that Palestinian security forces are not stopping militants from carrying out attacks.

However, Israeli Defense Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, a member of the moderate Labor Party, set a different condition for ending the blockade, demanding the surrender of 19 terror suspects in Arafat's office.

"The rest are not important," he told Israel Radio.

Israel has changed its demands several times, according to the Palestinians. Until Ben-Eliezer spoke, Israel was saying it would not withdraw from the compound until about 200 people holed up inside surrender, among them 50 allegedly involved in attacks on Israelis, including Palestinian intelligence chief Tawfik Tirawi.

Tirawi denied the allegations in an interview with the Israeli daily Maariv and vowed not to surrender.

"Yasser Arafat and I will fight to the last minute," Tirawi said.

Ben-Eliezer said talks were underway to resolve the standoff, but Palestinians canceled a meeting with Israeli officials set for Wednesday because Israel refused to allow representatives of the so-called Quartet to meet with Arafat first, said Palestinian Cabinet Minister Saeb Erekat, the chief negotiator.

The Quartet is made up of the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia, working for a solution to the Israel-Palestinian conflict.

Elsewhere in the West Bank, Israeli forces blew up three houses of Palestinian terror suspects, two in the tense, divided city of Hebron and one in the nearby town of Dura.

In recent weeks, Israel has been demolishing houses of suspected militants, saying the measure can serve as a deterrent.

Reporters Without Borders, a group defending the rights of journalists, issued a statement Wednesday criticizing Israel for the death of Palestinian radio reporter Issam Tilawi.

The group said he was shot by an Israeli sniper while wearing a "press" sign, charging that his killing was a "serious violation" of international rules about protection of civilians in wartime. Four Palestinians were killed in the clashes.

In violent incidents Wednesday, Palestinians fired three rockets at an Israeli village near Gaza, hitting a building, the military said. Nobody was hurt in the attack, the army said.

Two Israelis were wounded by Palestinian gunfire in a roadside shooting in the West Bank, the military said, and Palestinians said 15 people were wounded, one seriously, in a clash with Israeli forces in the Gaza Strip.

UTILITIES | Restructuring billing to minimize oversights

alleviate some of those problems."

The action was taken because the city recently discovered an underbilling of $352,578.51 for Colbert Hills Golf Course and a $15,000 underbilling mistake for Van Zile Dining Hall.

The Colbert Hills mistake occurred over a three-year period of time when a six-digit water usage system at the golf course meter was only being read as a five-digit system. This caused the meter to be off by a factor of 10.

The miscalculation was discovered in July, and the city is now working with Colbert Hills on a plan to pay off the bill.

The second mistake, discovered last week, was because of a malfunctioning meter at Van Zile. During a two-year period, meter readers indicated a dead meter at the site, Hayen said.

However, instead of billing K-State its average bill amount, a common procedure when the meters are broken, the city billed Van Zile $14.94 a month. The bill should have run between $600-$700 a month, Hayen said.

"We made a mistake," Hayen said. "Now we are working with the university to correct it."

Officials with Housing and Dining Services were out of the office Wednesday.

The city is purchasing the meter and the university is expected to install it. The city will then bill the university for the charge, Hayen said.

"That is a common practice among commercial users," he said.

Six other K-State meter problems also were discovered when the utilities department examined the city's larger meters. K-State is being billed the average consumption amount for three of the meters until they are repaired. The remaining three meters are used for irrigation or sporadic purposes, meaning they won't always be in use and if they are there is very minimal consumption, Hayen said.

To prevent missing another mistake, the city plans to include additional accountability reports. Some of the reports will include the following: a monthly management report that will contrast water production against water consumption; a monthly report comparing that month's largest users to past consumption history, showing any unusual levels, high or low, in consumption that should be investigated; and a report showing the six-month tracking of new industrial, commercial or university users and comparing them with similar types of users.

The meter reading equipment and computer software also will be routinely checked for quality control.

"It is important that the public has confidence in the municipal utility," Fehr said. "These are proactive measures to ensure these kinds of billing errors do not happen."

Student numbers increase

Higher tuition doesn't affect enrollment rate

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Enrollment at K-State has reached a record high, despite a 25-percent tuition increase.

According to fall 2002 figures released Thursday, total enrollment at the Manhattan campus increased by about 1 percent, or 366 students. Enrollment at the Salina campus increased by 65 students.

These figures make it the fourth consecutive year K-State has reached record enrollment.

Student Body President Zac Cook said the numbers squelched fears that tuition increases would negatively affect enrollment.

"I was as resistant as anyone else about tuition increases, but when people started going out and comparing it to the other schools, they found out it was still a good bargain and enrolled just like they planned before tuition went up."

He also said the numbers prove K-State's quality of education is worth the price.

"It's probably a testament to show that the education we get here is worth that much, because if it wasn't, we would start to see negative enrollment," Cook said. "So, the fact people keep coming shows it's worth that much."

Konza attracts visitors

Event organizers expect 2,000 for Konza Prairie Day

Hike it. Drive it. Wagon-wheel it.

As many as 2,000 visitors are expected to explore the Konza Prairie from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday at the biennial Konza Prairie Visitors Day.

Sponsored by K-State's Division of Biology and the Nature Conservancy, visitors will have the opportunity to tour the prairie's trails and observe ecological research in development.

"We want people to come, to understand what we're doing here, and why it's important," said Valerie Wright, environmental educator and naturalist for Konza Prairie. "By coming, you learn a lot about the research, ecology, climate, grazing and impact of fire on the prairie."

Throughout the past six months, about 100 university and community volunteers have been preparing for Visitors Day, Wright said.

Eva Horne, assistant professor of biology, is in her second year as assistant director for the Konza Prairie Biological Station to coordinate Visitors Day.

"Since one of our big roles is to teach people," Horne said, "Visitors Day is a way to teach the public about the prairie,

Hale's hours restored

Temporary solution found

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The voice of the students was heard, and they got what they wanted — for now.

After overwhelming student complaints and guidance from student leadership, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, will restore Hale Library hours to the same level as last year. Hours were reduced this fall after state budget cuts caused a deficit that forced the library to make $790,000 in cuts.

In addition to hours, travel, employee positions and supplies suffered reductions.

"This hours issue is 1 percent of the library's total budget problem," Hobrock said.

The funds to restore hours, totaling about $10,000, will come from a reserve fund in the President's Office.

"When students get involved, good things happen," Hobrock said. "Student Senate relayed to me that this was not a good thing and should be considered."

Student Body President

Zac Cook said the reinstatement of hours is a reflection of the administration's understanding of how important the library is to students.

"The library is the most necessary part of the the educational core on campus," Cook said. "You should cut a lot of things before the library."

However, the library will continue to open at 8 a.m. instead of 7:30 a.m. Hobrock said he will wait for student input on the effects of this reduction.

But the solution might not last for long. With mid-year budget cuts possible and even larger cuts expected in January, the library will be forced to make even more reductions.

"We've got a really big problem, and there will be many consequences," Hobrock said.

Cook said he hopes the Kansas Legislature will realize the effects budget cuts are having on higher education with examples such as the library's hours.

"It's only a temporary Band-Aid," he said. "Hopefully, the Legislature will start to realize the cuts in state budget

No LIMITATIONS

Rick Allen from Philadelphia plays the guitar as part of the 2nd Annual Rally for Nonviolence in the Union Plaza. The "free-speech zone" is used for several events throughout the year.

Free speech not restricted to designated zones

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a rising debate.

Across the nation, universities have implemented free speech zones. These zones, which restrict where demonstrations and free speech occur, have sparked a controversy.

Administrators say the zones keep order. Students say they infringe on rights.

So the debate has come down to one question: Are free-speech zones efficient forums or First Amendment violations?

At K-State, officials say the answer is clear.

"The whole campus here, historically, has been a free speech zone. Period. End of story. Good night," Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said.

Bosco said members of the K-State family are free to exercise their right to free speech anywhere on campus. They are not restricted to the area commonly referred to as the free-speech zone in the K-State Student Union Plaza.

However, that has not been the case at other universities.

Iowa State University, the University of Houston, Florida State University and West Virginia University all have been under fire for their free-speech zone policies. Students there were not allowed to protest, picket or demonstrate anywhere other than the free-speech zones. Students retaliated, saying it was their First Amendment right to speak out or demonstrate anywhere on campus.

The case at West Virginia University garnered national attention when the police were called on a student activist who wanted to distribute flyers about corporations and human rights outside the free speech zone. They said he only could hand them out in the designated free-speech zone.

That was in April 2002.

Since then, the debate has grown. Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said restricting speech to certain areas on state-owned property is against the law. Under the Public Forum Doctrine, the answer is simple, he said.

A&E anchor relates worldly experiences during lecture

"The real learning takes place when you leave here," Kurtis said. "Every story you cover will stay with you the rest of your life."

When Kurtis first began his career in television, he was studying for a bar exam at Washburn University when he got a call to fill in for an anchor on the 6 p.m. news at Topeka's WIBW-TV. As he was broadcasting, a tornado leveled eight of the 11 buildings at Washburn's campus.

"I realized I was going to be among a small fraternity, a fraternity of broadcasters whose words that they speak will mean life and death to the viewing audience."

After that dramatic moment, Kurtis decided God was sending him a sign that a TV

CAMPUS CONNECTION | Procrastination

Matt Warner, junior in bio-chemistry, studies revolutionary Europe in his residence hall room Thursday afternoon. Warner fell behind in the reading and is trying to make up for lost time.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

Students experience hardships of putting off homework

By Pete Elsasser
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Matt Warner has problems with procrastination, and he plans to improve his study habits — just not right now.

Warner, sophomore in biochemistry, said that at the beginning of the year, he had planned to avoid procrastinating.

"So far, I haven't been able to get my act together," he said. "I just do what I feel like doing. I just get distracted by other things easily."

Warner said he's come close to staying up all night several times this semester, but he hasn't necessarily noticed any drastic health effects.

"I'm just really stinking tired," he said. "I get stressed out all the time though."

Deborah Murray, English instructor and director of the writing center, said procrastination is a bigger problem for freshmen.

"In high school, they could get away with waiting until the last minute," she said. "Once they get to college, they have greater demands. It doesn't work."

Murray said she's noticed sleep deprivation as a big effect of procrastination.

"It's like they're under the influence," she said. "Their thoughts don't flow in their papers when they're taking exams."

Warner said he has no idea what his life would be like if he adjusted his study habits to avoid procrastinating.

"Since I've never actually done homework or studied without procrastinating, I have nothing to compare it with," he said. "I have plans to improve, but it won't happen immediately."

A closer look

Many of the issues at K-State also affect some of America's other universities. Campus Connection offers a side-by-side view at how some of them are addressed here and at other schools.

Procrastinators more susceptible to health problems

By Myiah Hutchens
WASHINGTON STATE DAILY EVERGREEN

PULLMAN, Wash. - Even as deadlines approach, students put off doing homework.

A new study from Carlton University pointed out several negative effects of the habit.

College students who procrastinate are more likely to have unhealthy habits and are more likely to get sick, according to the study presented in August at the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association.

The study showed that students who procrastinate tend to have more digestive problems, cold and flu symptoms and a higher rate of insomnia than the rest of the student population.

Lisa Mancuso, a counseling assistant at WSU Counseling Services, said she agreed.

"Procrastinators are always running, because they are always behind," she said.

Most people do not associate health problems with procrastination, Mancuso said.

She said she never has had students come in and say they want to fix their procrastination problems.

She said students typically will come into Counseling Services complaining about anxiety, substance abuse or feeling worn down.

Wefald to become newest member of Scandinavian-American Hall of Fame

President will return to North Dakota for induction event to honor deeds

By Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For 1 1/2 years, Jon Wefald lived in a two-room motel in Minot, N.D.

In the fall of 1949, Wefald had no idea he would return to Minot 53 years later to be inducted into the Scandinavian-American Hall of Fame during the town's Norsk Hostfest, or that he would be serving as president of K-State.

"I come from a poor family," Wefald said. "It was kind of like, you might be viewed as living on the other side of the street. And I was just an average student, never superior. It wasn't until I got into college that I started focusing to do well."

Wefald will return Oct. 9 to Minot, home of the Scandinavian-American Hall of Fame, to be inducted along with professional skier Alf Engen and Grammy-winner Peggy Lee.

Dale Brown, former basketball coach at Louisiana State University, will present Wefald with honors.

The two friends graduated from neighboring high schools in Minot and competed against each other on rival basketball teams in the 50s.

Brown, who nominated Wefald for the hall of fame, received the hall of fame's Humanitarian Award in 1997. He praised Wefald's communication abilities.

"He is a guy who doesn't have his head buried under the sand, like many other administrators at Division I schools do," Brown said.

"He has never lost his humbleness. He has the complete technique of being a true college president, there aren't many administrators in that position. Too many of them have their noses in the sky."

Wefald's son, Skip, said the Scandinavian heritage is very important in places such as North Dakota, and Minnesota, where Wefald raised his family.

Skip said he felt his father deserved the award.

"We're really happy for him, because it is a really big deal for him," Skip said.

Linda Bromley, administrative assistant for Norsk Hostfest, described Minot as a rural community with a population of about 35,000, located in the northwestern corner of North Dakota.

Bromley said the hall has inducted 55 individuals since it began in 1984, including Charles Lindbergh, Buzz Aldrin and Walter Mondale.

"We look for Scandinavian-American background, and that they have excelled in their line of work, or what they've done with their life," she said.

For 25 years, thousands of Minot volunteers have organized Norsk Hostfest, making it the largest Scandinavian-American festival on the continent, executive director Pam Davy said.

More than 200 performers such as Bill Cosby, Tim Conway, Mel Tillis, Wayne Newton and Charley Pride will entertain for 55,000 visitors who are expected to attend.

In the past, festival-goers have come from across America, Canada and Scandinavia, Bromley said.

Wefald's biography will be engraved on a plaque and added to a permanent display during the Norsk Hostfest.

Davy said Wefald will be a nice addition to the hall of fame.

"His name has been before the committee many times before," Davy said.

"They've always been interested in him, because he's local. He's very well-liked, very respected, and they've been following his career for a number of years."

Wefald expressed his excitement about the award.

"For a young man from Minot, North Dakota, to imagine that one day you might be in a hall of fame, you'd never believe it," Wefald said.

TO THE POINT Reinstatement of library hours temporary fix

Although Hale Library hours have been reinstated, the fix is just a temporary solution to a much bigger problem.

We thank the university for listening to the students and pulling funds from a reserve account to assist Hale, but we urge students to prepare themselves for what will come in the future.

Hale is one of the many places on campus that suffered when the state Legislature announced budget cuts. Library officials originally reduced hours to keep funds available for materials. With more cutbacks looming ahead, Hale will be forced to cut its spending even more.

Students should take advantage of what the university has recently done. This issue is just one example of how Student Senate and administration does, and will, listen to students when they voice their concerns.

This temporary solution will be a trial period, though. Students must make the reinstatement worthwhile by using Hale as often as they can. Evaluate what you value more about Hale. The hours of operation, or the materials.

Take advantage of, but don't take for granted, this short-term fix to a much larger dilemma allows for an easier flow of traffic that should, in turn, help to prevent accidents.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

FUZZY MATH

City, county should watch finances closer, prevent mistakes when facing tight budgets

By now, almost everyone is aware the United States is in serious economic straits.

And Kansans realize their state is suffering a significant budget crisis.

But if Manhattan and Riley County are templates by which to judge, some of the worst financial problems may be happening at the local government level.

Funds already are stretched thin in many places, and the situation only compounds when avoidable errors are made.

When money gets tight, there is no extra funding to cover mistakes, and even more budget cuts and tax increases become necessary to break even.

Some examples of this affecting K-State students directly have occurred within the last two months.

For starters, on Aug. 15, the Riley County Appraiser's office discovered that an employee had accidentally valued a house on Pomeroy Street at $200,059,000.

I would guess there aren't many houses that nice in Manhattan, and certainly none on Pomeroy. If so, that would be one rich landlord.

Apparently, no one in the appraiser's office scratched his or her head over this like I did, until it was too late.

By the time they figured out it was supposed to be $59,500, the county, city and school district already had finalized their budgets based on the incorrect figure.

Luckily for Manhattan residents, USD 383 was able to readjust its spending plan by $230,000. Had it not done so, homeowners would have been taxed to the tune of $1.9 million.

There still will be a tax increase, though. The city added one mil to the property tax levy, a rise of $280,564. And it could have been worse.

To avoid a four-mil boost, City Manager Ron Fehr met with a management team to cut $430,436 from the city budget and $250,000 from reserves.

These cuts will be felt in the form of reduced emergency services and decreased parks and recreation funding.

This isn't the only numbers quandary the city has to handle, either.

Due to various silly oversights, Manhattan has been underbidding two large water-consuming entities: Colbert Hills Golf Course and — drum roll, please — K-State.

In one of the great miscommunications of recent history, city officials ended up reading Colbert Hills' six-digit meter as a five-digit meter. Now, the golf course owes about $382,000 in bills.

As for K-State, Van Zile Dining Hall was getting the discount deal — $14.94 per month — but its meter wasn't misread, just broken.

Since the normal charge would be somewhere between $600 and $700 a month, it's not improper to ask why this wasn't caught, especially since the cost of this error is $15,000.

True, the responsibility lies with many parties. Both the golf course and K-State might have noticed their bills didn't seem right.

The city and the county, though, are the last lines of defense in preventing and solving these errors. Taxpayers and voters should keep these public employees directly accountable. This cannot be done with K-State officials, who are not elected by the public.

These screw-ups are mistakes that inevitably will happen in any bureaucracy, but the time for vacillating and making excuses is at an end.

With the economy like it is, we can't afford to tolerate stupid little bookkeeping boo-boos that end up costing thousands, if not millions.

The city's reorganization of its water and billing operations is a step in the right direction, but it means nothing if officials continue overlooking simple mistakes.

Everyone should try to exercise despite others' intimidating regimens

KATHRYN HOLLINGSWORTH

Exercise is the trend, and everyone should jump on the bandwagon.

I'm about 50 yards behind and running to catch the competition.

I like to exercise. My roommate and I faithfully do our stomach crunches and stretching every night. We also throw in the occasional tennis game for a really strenuous workout.

Our laid-back approach to exercise makes it fun and enjoyable. With the formidable Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex a half a block from our apartment, we may stop there one day — if we have time.

Needless to say, my attitude toward fitness has been mediocre.

I was happy with my position in the apathetic category of the fitness world. However, when I see the diehards with smiles of self-satisfaction and natural energy, I am a little jealous.

Who are the diehards?

They are human beings who arise at 5 a.m. to run, lift weights and do other excruciating routines. They know their blood pressure, weight and fat percentage on any given day, and they find time for fitness no matter how busy their schedules.

I want to be a diehard, but it's a hard act to follow.

I've tried getting up at 5 a.m. to work out. However, when my eyes popped open and I realized it was dark outside, I couldn't believe I considered doing that to myself.

I can get up in the morning when there is money involved, but the joy of exercise just isn't enough.

The truly fitness-insane can be spotted on the streets and sidewalks of Manhattan. Imagine — it's around 2 in the afternoon, the heat index is about 120 degrees, and there are people running.

Why?

Sweat is pouring down their flushed faces, their mouths are twisted into a determined grimace bespeaking immense pain and their eyes are drooping from exhaustion and heat.

If it is the only time they can fit running into their schedule, I understand. But why don't they run at night?

It hurts me just to watch them sprinting toward a heat stroke.

The diehards intimidate me. To put it lightly, I'm not one of the most graceful people on earth.

My roommates revel in the entertainment of watching me attempt Tae Bo. As far as tennis is concerned, I don't think I'll be boarding the bus to Wimbledon anytime soon.

I might never reach my goal of becoming a diehard, but I have learned an important lesson. If you can only walk half a block, you should still exercise.

The diehards might crush you under their feet, but staying healthy is worth the embarrassment. No one just wakes up one morning and feels like running 10 miles — everyone has to start somewhere.

According to www.healthclubs.com, more than 60 percent of adults do not do the recommended amount of physical activity.

The site also states that inactivity is more common among women than men and increases with age.

Couple this with processed food, and we have a serious problem.

Americans have to incorporate some form of exercise into their daily routines.

Exercise aids in preventing heart disease — a No. 1 killer in America — and a host of other health problems.

Whether couch potato, athlete, stoner, diehard or lazy, we all have one thing in common: we have a tool to work with, and shaping and taking care of it is our decision.

It's time to face the music. I definitely won't get up at 5 a.m. to work out, but maybe by 6:30 I'll be able to crawl to the gym.

One of these days, I'll enjoy running in insufferable heat and arising at the crack of dawn. Until then, this is going to hurt.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

If any eligible bachelors need a date, please come to sixth floor Moore Hall.

OK, everyone listen this time so we don't have to have this same discussion every six months. Fourum is spelled that way because there are four 4s in the phone number.

The Bible was obviously created by people who don't know anything about evolution.

Larry, I forgot my phone number. Could you please give me yours?

What part of "Tow zone: no parking" don't you understand, Johnson County?

I just had sex with Dead Lehon.

The rolls in the first stall are so tight that the paper only comes off one square at a time, so why do I insist on returning time after time?

Girl who climb window in bra at night have very bad cough next day.

To the guy who called in about having man-boobs: That's better than having no boobs and being female.

It's about time a girl admits to whacking.

From my experience, masturbation also cures constipation.

It sucks being the 20 percent not having sex.

If 17,000 people are having sex tonight, that's awesome.

The people not having sex tonight are calling the readers' Fourum.

What exactly is Dead Lemon?

Chocolate milk should be at the base of the food pyramid. It's my staple food.

Paul White has fallen, and he's never going to get up.

I am fat, I am fat, I am fat, I am fat. Oh, yeah, did I mention I am fat?

Masturbation, Kate? You have no class.

Ben, the biology T.A., is hot.

Check this out: on the way to class this morning, I saw two squirrels having sex.

To Paul White: Change the water in your bong. Your paranoia is getting to me.

To all students: Beware the free shrimp. Beware the free shrimp.

If 17,600 K-State students are having sex, how come I'm not getting any?

Here is the funniest comment made to me today: Hey, Joe, do you know what's so great about these shirts? Green belly-button lint.

Dana Strongin, can I be your studmuffin?

Thanks to Anna Wetzel's art in Thursday's Collegian, I will never visit any kind of doctor again ... ever.

Do you know the way to San Jose?

I was just wondering if the football players get paid for the weekends they don't have games.

You know what the world needs more of? Midgets.

It's a sad, sad day when I'm in the 20 percent of 22,000 students who aren't getting laid.

Threesome, threesome, threesome. Yeah, baby.

I want a girl who will be the guy in a relationship.

I'd just like to say to the dirty person who stole my Playstation: You're going to die. Yeah, but you didn't get Bond. It's all good.

In regards to the sex article, whacking off is the devil. By the way, love the new message.

Hey, gay Putnam dude: that's the most pathetic attempt I've ever seen for a guy to get chicks.

I just wanted to let the girl who was talking about how cool it is to masturbate know that I sent the article to her parents.

"F" for friendly, "O" for opinion, "R" for recording, "U" for university and "M" for management. Did I answer your question?

To the guys who placed the flowers at the girl's apartment at 1823 Platt: they were very appreciated, and keep doing it.

I shot a squirrel with a water gun. I had fun. Is that bad?

I just lost a buck ... to myself.

There are 10 kinds of people in this world: those who understand binary and those who don't.

So the Kansas BEA says I can't be a pot-head anymore. I fear I'm becoming an alcoholic.

To the two funniest guys in Manhattan, I have two words for you — oh, boy.

University increases chances of restaurant development

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It will soon be harder for Manhattan residents and students to complain about finding places to eat.

In the coming months, Manhattan residents can look forward to the arrival of new restaurants in the area, said Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

While there are no definite plans yet, interested restaurant developers have continued to keep an eye on the Manhattan area to start new restaurants and extended chains.

"There are restaurants from chains as well as some independent ones that have been looking at Manhattan," Butler said. "They are constantly looking at our demographics."

With the addition of a new Dairy Queen this summer and the new Buffalo Wings restaurant opening soon in Aggieville, the restaurant market continues to grow in Manhattan, a trend that is popular among smaller towns with large universities.

"When you have a major university, it gives Manhattan a little bit of an edge," Butler said. "Restaurants will know they'll get a boost from home sports activities and other activities offered through the university."

Butler added that with a university in the area, a number of chain restaurants are able to have a successful business.

"If we didn't have a major university, we would not be able to have the number of fast food restaurants we have," he said.

David Sauter, co-owner of the Marco Polo Ristorante, said there are several reasons their family-owned business has been so successful.

"We have good food at reasonable prices and a comfortable atmosphere," he said. "We're different from a lot of restaurants in that we don't try to hustle our customers through. We want them to enjoy our atmosphere and stick around for a while and enjoy the person that you come with."

Butler said the individual and large-chain developers interested in starting a restaurant tend to base their decision on the town's size, population growth and, most importantly, market growth.

"Some of it is driven by perception, and sometimes it's a reality," he said. "If a particular restaurant is already doing well here, it attracts other restaurants. Sometimes people make the perception on what the taste of Manhattanites are."

Also, a majority of national chains have certain population thresholds and only will look at a community with a certain number of people, Butler said.

With a Home Depot and a Target coming into Manhattan, future developers are looking at building new restaurants at both sites and around that area.

"There's quite a few of them that you'll probably see over the next several months," Butler said. "A lot of that depends on the overall economy, but there are a lot of people looking around at the new Home Depot and Target areas."

Although there is a possibility of large-chain restaurants coming to Manhattan with the new development of two large businesses, Sauter said he is not worried about his restaurant's future business.

"Competition is certainly not going to help business, but we haven't changed our prices in three years, and we're very competitive with a lot of the companies around," he said.

North Korea expected to seek economic aid from U.S.

By George Gedda
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

North Korea is expected to seek economic aid as well as security assurances from the United States when bilateral talks resume on Oct. 3 in Pyongyang, U.S. officials said Thursday.

The White House announced that Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly will head the U.S. delegation for the discussions, the first in almost two years with North Korea.

Labeled with Iran and Iraq by President Bush as part of an "axis of evil," North Korea is the only one of those countries engaged in a reform program and the only one with which Washington is holding discussions.

It is not clear how the negotiating process will unfold.

The two sides have not discussed what will happen after the conclusion of Kelly's three-day visit. No one is expecting early agreement on any of the long list of issues confronting the two countries.

The officials said they are encouraged by signs of new thinking in Pyongyang on both domestic and international issues.

North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, has been taking steps lately to rescue his country from economic collapse, introducing market-oriented reforms.

North Korea recently announced plans to establish a capitalist enclave in the northwestern part of the country along the border with China. There also has been talk of major deals with Russia involving rail links and a gas pipeline.

Cross country will see better talent in Minnesota

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The last time K-State cross country ran competitively, the top three places from both the men's and women's teams were by three sophomores and three freshmen.

The race also took place on a course about two-thirds the standard length, and featured primarily in-state competition.

For the inexperienced Cats, Saturday's meet in Minnesota will represent the first big step.

"This weekend is kind of like stepping into the frying pan," Coach Randy Cole said.

The team is heading to the 18th Annual Roy Graik Invitational at the University of Minnesota.

For the Cats, the scaled-down courses and local competition are a thing of the past, as the conditions in Minnesota will be the toughest they have faced this season.

"We will see schools from different parts of the country," Cole said. "With the level of competition, they will really see what collegiate cross country is all about."

On Saturday, the men's 28 team field will be stacked with nationally ranked squads like No. 4 Wisconsin, No. 9 Oregon and No. 10 Providence. Overall, 11 squads on the men's side rank in the top 30 by the United States Cross Country Coaches Association.

It will not be any easier for the women. Among the 22 Division-I schools sending women's teams, eight are ranked in the top 30 in the FinishLynx NCAA Division-I Cross Country Poll.

However, more runners will be an advantage, Cole said.

At the K-State Wildcat Invitational, a meet two weeks ago that featured only five teams, Cole said runners like Wildcat sophomore Shauna Burrell found themselves without a pack to follow.

"Shauna was actually behind the first four runners, but still ahead of the rest," Cole said. "It won't be like that at Minnesota. There will be people the whole way."

Saturday's race also will mark the first time the Cats will broach the distance they run at the Big 12 Championship.

The K-State men ran two miles in the first race and then 6,400 meters in the second competition. The women also raced two miles and then 4,000 meters.

At Minnesota, the course for the men will be 8,000 meters long, and the course for the women will be 6,000 meters.

"The length will be a learning experience," Cole said.

"We are fairly young, and we need to see how we pace ourselves for the whole distance. We want to see how intelligently and aggressively people can run."

The competition this weekend also is important for another reason. Many of the teams the Cats will face in Minnesota, they will meet again in a couple of weeks at the Big 12 Championship meet in Columbia, Mo.

This weekend, K-State will face teams from Iowa State, Texas A&M, Nebraska and Texas.

"Both the men and the women will run versus other conference teams," Cole said. "We will use it as a little bit of a gauge versus those teams. We just want to see what happens so we can be ready for the conference championships in November."

St. Louis Rams All-Pro offensive tackle Orlando Pace sustained a partially torn left calf muscle in practice Wednesday and might miss Sunday's game against the Dallas Cowboys.

An MRI Wednesday night revealed the damage. Pace was wearing a walking cast Thursday, but wasn't counting him out of the game yet.

"We're going to see how it feels and see how it heals," Pace said. "Hopefully we'll see tomorrow."

Pace, the first overall pick of the 1997 draft, has made 75 consecutive starts.

Is wrestling a sport you like to watch on television? If you are a wrestling fan, attend the intramural wrestling meet Monday through Thursday. Competition will begin at 7 p.m. each night in the Recreational Services' small gym. The all-university championships will be Thursday.

The wrestling tournament will consist of one single-elimination tournament per weight class in each division. All matches will be three, 1-minute, 30-second periods. Men and women can participate in this event in their specified weight classes. The men's weight classes include: 126, 134, 142, 150, 158, 166, 175, 185, 196 and heavy-weight. The women's weight classes include 135 and under, and 136 and over.

Awards will be given to the champion in each weight class of each division in which there are two or more competitors and to the winning teams in each division.

Mangino's antics show lack of class

Responsible fathers take youth sports with grain of salt

COLBY GORDON

You'll have to excuse my colleague Ben Fehr for predicting that the Wildcats will run the table this year.

His love for K-State has caused him to have a distorted vision of the college football world.

Going undefeated in college football is nearly impossible, and the Wildcats are not exactly the Miami Hurricanes.

In our somewhat impressive win against an over-ranked USC squad, the Cats turned the ball over a startling five times.

Do that against Texas, and K-State will lose by at least three touchdowns.

At this point, there has been no solid evidence presented to me as to why the Wildcats will beat Texas. Our Ell Roberson-led offense moved the ball against USC, but will be hard-pressed to score points against a better and frightfully faster Longhorn defense.

The K-State defense is superb, but can we cover a healthy Roy Williams, B.J. Johnson and Sloan Thomas — not to mention Cedric Benson coming out of the backfield?

Games against Nebraska and Iowa State at home are only lightly penciled-in victories right now, and as long as Seneca Wallace is running the show for the Cyclones, they pose an enormous threat.

There are no road challenges for the Cats until the last game of the year at Missouri.

The Tigers always play K-State tough in Columbia and are especially dangerous this year with quarterback Brad Smith, who is similar to Roberson, except he is a better passer and makes better decisions.

With that said, let's get into the meat and potatoes of the issue.

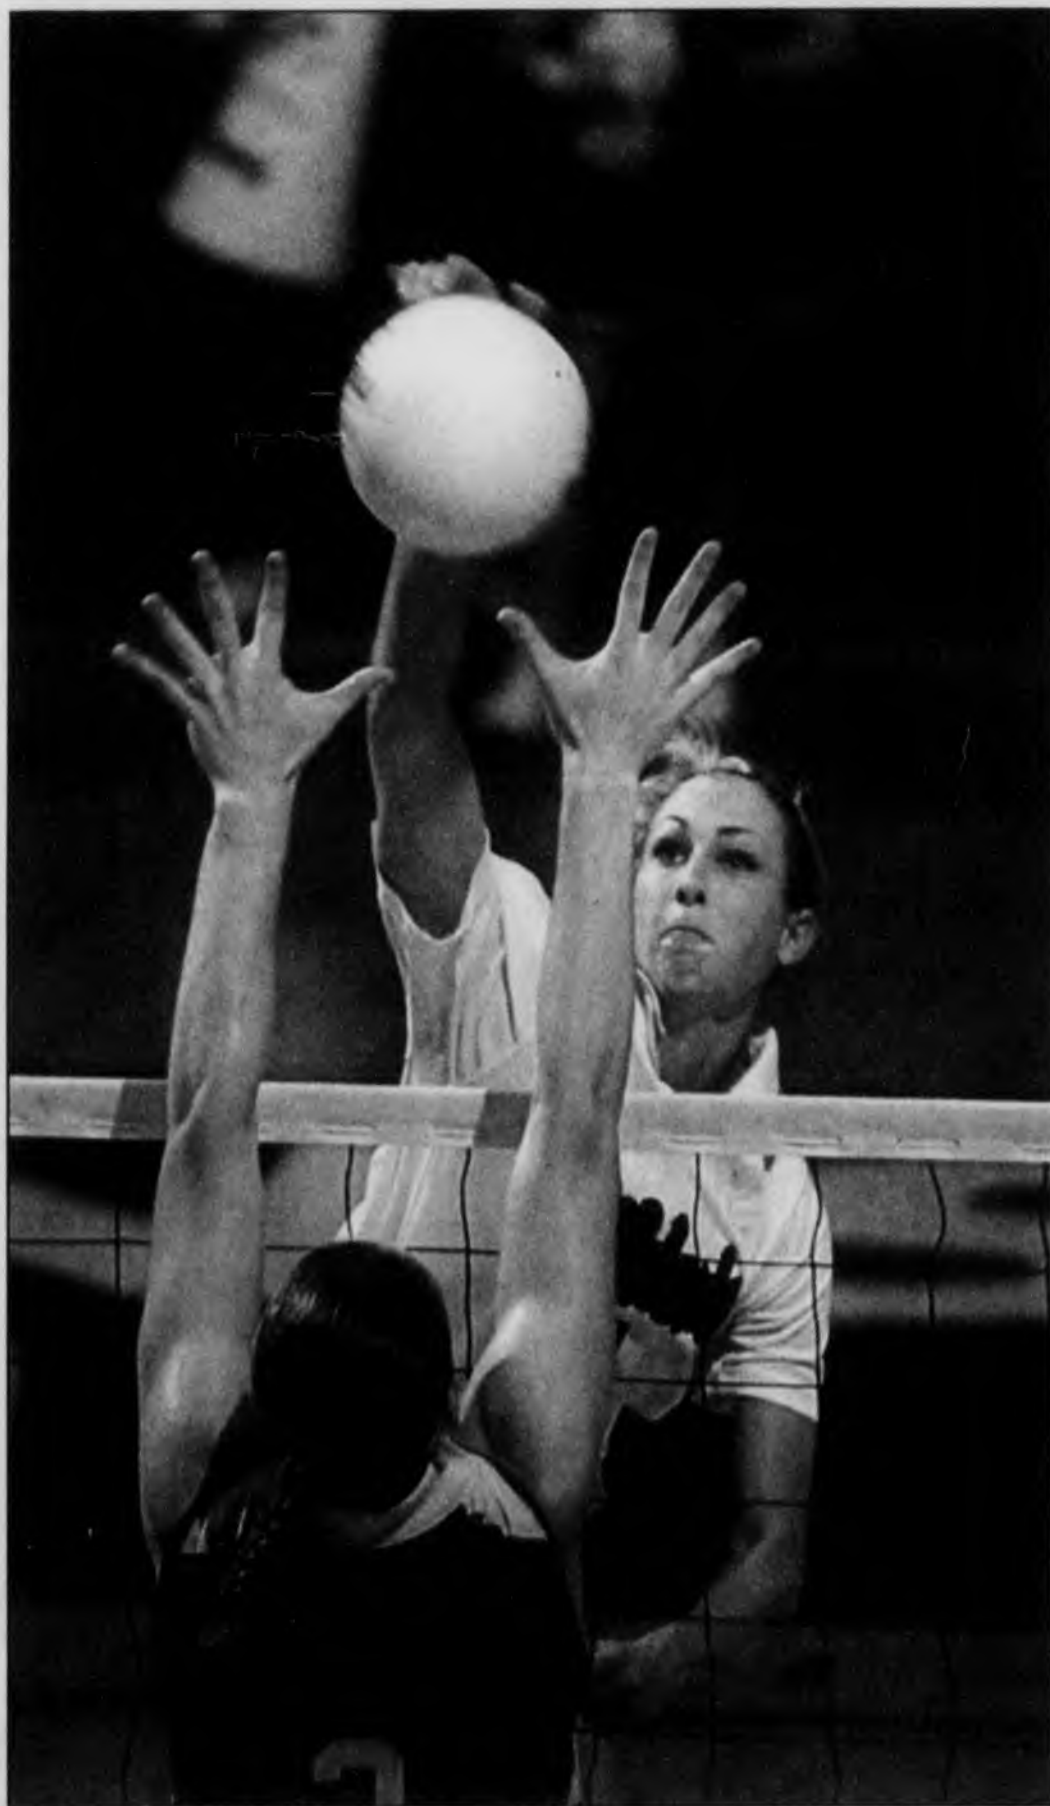

Kansas coach Mark Mangino is in trouble with Lawrence High officials, which might cause him to be barred from attending the next Lions' home game.

Mangino's son Tommy, the starting quarterback at Lawrence High School, was supposedly hit hard late in his game last Friday night against Olathe East.

Mangino apparently thought the hit was a cheap shot and was seen yelling, cussing and pointing his finger at game officials as they left Haskell Stadium.

Mangino said of the incident: "I reacted the way a responsible father ought to react

Volleyball team hopes to gain 3rd win Saturday

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's time to mess with Texas.

After losing the conference opener at home against Nebraska, K-State's volleyball team has won two straight on the road over Baylor and Iowa State. The Wildcats face Texas at home Saturday in Ahearn Field House — looking to extend their winning streak to three.

And if matches with Texas go as they have in the past, K-State should extend that streak.

The Cats (6-5, 2-1) beat the Longhorns (9-3, 1-2) in four games in both meetings last year and haven't lost to UT since 1998.

Last season, Texas was ranked 23rd when they came to Ahearn. K-State, though, has been able to handle the Longhorns despite many close games.

Texas was 3-0 in Big 12 play at this time last year.

This time, they are off to just a 1-2

Even though the Longhorns might seem like a different team on paper, Coach Suzie Fritz said they are the same team they always are.

"They're very big and very physical," Fritz said.

Texas welcomes back 6-foot-2 sophomore Mira Topic, their go-to outside hitter. Topic is one of five sophomores on the Longhorn squad, on which there are no seniors.

But the apparent inexperience of this team shouldn't be overlooked, Fritz said. The size of this team is a powerful weapon the Cats will have to overcome in order to win, she said.

Jami Slichter attempts to hit the ball during K-State's match against Nebraska. The volleyball team is 6-5 overall and 2-1 in the Big 12.

"They're good," Fritz said. "I think they will be better than they've ever been."

K-State has been used to playing teams that fall under that category, though.

Arthur Capper Cooperative Center to receive $300,000 in federal funds

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Kansas Sen. Pat Roberts announced K-State's Arthur Capper Cooperative Center will receive a $300,000 grant from the Department of Agriculture's Rural Development office.

The ACCC, located in the Department of Agricultural Economics, works jointly with the Kansas Cooperative Development Center to help various producer-led groups who are looking into value-added businesses, said David Coltrain, program leader for the KDCD.

Coltrain said value-added businesses are interested in taking a raw commodity and changing it into something valuable to consumers, such as changing wheat into flour.

"We received the grant through a Rural Cooperative Development grant," he said. "These grants are to help groups with their value-added businesses and for improvements with the cooperative education program."

In addition to working closely with the ACCC, the KDCD works hard to encourage and assist business development that is focused on value-added marketing and processing of agriculture products, Coltrain said.

"There's a whole host of groups of producers in Kansas who have organized and come together to try and evaluate some form of value-added venture," said Dan Bernardo, head of agricultural economics department. "The primary use of the funds is to offer and award small grants to groups of producers who want to evaluate the feasibility of the particular value-added agriculture interests."

In order to receive the award, the ACCC must prove they have administered state-wide coordinating projects and that they have provided technical assistance in previous years, Coltrain said.

"It's based on performance that you've done in the past," he said. "You have to continue to do a good job with the grant that you've received in the past to be awarded again."

During the past five years, the ACCC has helped 25 value-added groups get a portion of each year's grant.

In addition, Coltrain said the grant has increased in value each year the ACCC has received it, an honor that the agricultural economics department has taken seriously.

"I think that it says the granting agency feels that we're making significant contributions in the area," Bernardo said.

"There are more and more producers and groups out there seeking assistance from K-State in the area of value-added agriculture."

Manhattan, Riley County officials discuss policy for Urban Area Comprehensive Plan

By Dana Strongin
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The environment, traffic and housing were among the top issues on the minds working to plan the future of Manhattan on Thursday night.

The project advisory committee for the Manhattan Urban Area Comprehensive Plan Update met at City Hall to discuss the policies for a plan outlining the city's future.

The plan, a joint effort of the city and Riley County, is part of a planning initiative updating the current plan, which was adopted in 1991. Planning involves different types of meetings, including a workshop on Wednesday for the public to share their concerns.

Thursday's meeting was for committee members, which include representatives from city and county governments, local businesses, neighborhoods and other entities, including K-State.

Members discussed the policy framework document, which will guide officials who implement the final plan.

Traffic in neighborhoods was a primary concern for member Vernon Deines, who suggested the city consider closing off certain roads or using barriers like cul-de-sacs to restrict traffic.

But that may not be the most logical solution, said Ben Herman, vice president of Clarion Associates, the company the city and county hired to help with planning.

"You can't eliminate the traffic flow of areas," Herman said.

"If you have a grid system, traffic is spread out, but if you close off streets, they get clogged."

Member Janet Throne said she was concerned about housing because college students, instead of regular homeowners, now live next door to her home on Westwind Drive.

Throne also mentioned several environmental issues outlined in the policy draft. She talked about connecting trails, preserving rural residential areas and the importance of stressing the benefits of wildlife habitats.

"These areas do not just have scenic quality or serve as wildlife habitat - there is more to it," Throne said, citing erosion and groundwater issues.

David Darling, K-State extension specialist in agricultural economics, attended the meeting to express his concern about the plan. He said the plan may not change the problems his neighborhood, University Heights, already has had with the city.

"Some of the city's decisions show they are willing to trash neighborhoods," Darling said.

ROCKIN' FOR CHARITY

Matt Elliott | COLLEGIAN

Bro (Matthew Pemberton), vocalist and guitarist for the Pembertons, sings at Auntie Mae's Parlor. The Pembertons will be featured at Saturday's music festival at O'Malley's.

O'Malley's to bring scope of bands together to benefit Big Brothers, Big Sisters

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hippies, hillbillies and rock fans all will find something enjoyable in the all-day music festival Saturday.

Toted as the hippie, hillbilly rockfest, the festival will last most of Saturday at O'Malley's, and all proceeds will go to the Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc. Scholar, Loco Macheen, the Pembertons and Mother Kali all will play in the festival with performers brought in by Tony "Buck" Buckner, the event co-organizer who is the host of O'Malley's Open Mic Night, to play between sets.

Event co-organizer and Mother Kali percussionist, Clint Hutchens, said he wanted to put on an all-day festival that would benefit a children's charity.

"My idea was to do something that would last all day long with mostly good, mellow, college-style music," he said.

Hutchens said hippies, hillbillies and rock fans will enjoy the show because rock, country and jam music are all a part of the festival. But that wouldn't have meant much if the music had been scheduled for the wrong weekend.

"We made sure to pick a good weekend when there wasn't a K-State game even on TV," he said. "All the bands will play full sets so people will really understand what each one is about."

Each of the four bands has its own following in Manhattan without much crossover. Hopefully that will mean more people will come to the festival for one band, and watch the others as well, Buckner said.

"All four bands have something different to offer," he said. "We picked these four because at any given time one of them is playing with another band that isn't in this lineup.

"That starts a pyramid effect. If you go to see one band at this show and you end up liking the Pembertons, you can go to a Pembertons show and see one or two more bands you haven't seen before. These four bands gig quite a bit in this town and they bring other bands."

Unique to this festival is its pre-9 p.m. all-ages status. Buckner said he would like to see it be an event for families. He has a face-painter scheduled to be there and has invited children from the Big Brothers and Sisters to come to the show.

The goal is to show a different side of Aggieville, Hutchens said.

"Aggieville seems like it's only a family place on game days," he said. "We want to let everyone know Aggieville is here for the whole town. It's not just a place for college students to get drunk."

Loco Macheen combines several styles, instruments to appeal to whole audience

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Incorporating seven members, nine instruments, and every style the members can think to write in, Loco Macheen is possibly the most eclectic band around.

A better word might be schizophrenic, at least that's how Joshua Finley, Emporia, Kan., said he feels when the band plays a show and he switches between, drums, hand percussion, bass, guitar, mandolin and a lap steel guitar. Finley said the band plays in many different styles and will please every member of an audience for at least one song.

The band serves as an outlet for all the things members have wanted to work with, but never been able to. All seven members write songs and take on vocal responsibilities.

Q: What is it like being in such a mixed band?

A: I've never been in a band before where I played this many instruments. I'm a bass player, and I only play bass on one song out of 40. I also play bass for Mother Kali.

We often refer to ourselves as schizophrenic. We purposefully organize our set lists so that one song will be a 180 degree spin from the one before it, and different from the next one. If we do a hard, fast punk song, the next one might be a slow caribbean song. Then we'll play a jazz tune.

Q: You actually have punk rock songs in a seven-member jam-style band?

A: Yeah, we actually do a punk song with both the guitars going hard and a fast drum beat and everything.

Q: Do you ever have problems playing such a strange mix in a live show so that people will get it and enjoy it?

A: Yeah, all the time. That's been our biggest problem. Loco Macheen has a hard time translating live because so many different things are happening. But at the same time, it can work for us.

Heavy metal, jazz, swing fans, and everyone else is sitting there, and we'll play at least one song that caters to each person sitting there. Sometimes the crowd has a hard time with that, but we want to cater to them as well. When we find something that's working, we'll keep on it for a while.

When you've got seven guys playing from different backgrounds and they're all songwriters, we really have no other choice.

The piano player is from a 100-percent jazz background, and now he's learning to be the fastest country player, and he can tear it up on ragtime.

I've never played Latin music before, but I'm learning all that. The drummer is learning punk rock beats. It's an experiment for everyone. Three of the instruments I play in the band I learned in the last year and a half with them.

Q: What are the benefits of that for you as a musician?

A: I'm an artist as well, so I'll put it in these terms: I've drawn with pencil my whole life and in the last three years, I've tried watercolor and acrylics and oils. I've learned more about textures and styles and uses because of it. The more you learn, the more rounded you become in music as well as in art.

It gives me a jumpstart on everything. It makes for easier songwriting because I don't have to struggle with how things go. I don't have to rely on someone else putting something down, even though the guys in the band are all way skilled. But if I don't think the guitar player can come up with the right guitar line, I can put that down myself. We try to keep the material coming quickly. We try to stay as new and innovative as possible.

'Big Fat' sitcom planned on CBS

"My Big Fat Greek Wedding," this year's surprise box-office hit, is moving the celebration to television.

A sitcom based on the movie is planned for midseason, a CBS spokeswoman said Wednesday. Nia Vardalos, who wrote the film script based on her one-woman show, will reprise her role as a Greek-American woman juggling romance and family.

The cast has yet to be confirmed but reportedly will include Michael Constantine and Lainie Kazan, who play Vardalos' parents in the film. John Corbett, who plays the groom, is committed to another series, FX's "Lucky."

BOX OFFICE

'Barbershop' continues to clip competition at box office

LOS ANGELES — The urban ensemble comedy "Barbershop" clipped the competition again at the weekend box office, earning $12.8 million to stay in first place.

ENROLLMENT | Officials say numbers prove KSU still affordable

Administrators began talk of a tuition increase last spring, saying it was needed to maintain K-State as a competitive university. When the final percentage was proposed and passed, many were concerned it would make college unaffordable.

John Fairman, assistant vice president of institutional advancement, said there is a point when tuition can make college unaffordable, but K-State has not reached that point.

"I don't think we have reached that, and I hope we never do reach it," Fairman said. "But, when you are competing for faculty nationally, you can't just turn to the state government for that support. It has to be a package, as it is everywhere else, and tuition is a part of that ability to attract and retain faculty."

At the Manhattan campus, new freshman enrollment actually increased by 40 students, reaching 3,239.

Enrollment

Manhattan campus
Fall 2002: 22,762
Fall 2001: 22,396

Salina campus
Fall 2002: 1,099
Fall 2001: 1,034

"We were fortunate enough to communicate to prospective students and their families the value of the K-State experience," Dean of Student Life Pat Bosco said.

"That's a direct result of our teaching faculty, our academic advisers and the staff in our student services programs."

Overall, Bosco said the increase speaks well of teaching faculty and the quality of K-State's environment.

"Word of mouth is huge in our state," Bosco said, "and we're fortunate in that not only K-State students are having a very positive experience here, but they are telling their friends and neighbors, and it's not just this year, it's several years."

SPEECH | Free speech zone not only area on campus to exercise rights

"People are able to practice free speech everywhere," he said.

If university officials tell students they cannot practice outside the free speech zone, the officials are not consistent with the rules, he said.

"The basic rule is pretty simple. As long as you are somewhere where the public is allowed to be, you aren't disrupting traffic or classes, you have a right to be there," Simon said. "The problem is when you start regulating who speaks there. The Supreme Court is very clear on you can't do that."

Universities can determine where, when and how long someone exercises their freedom of speech. But Bosco said K-State only does this with outside groups. The area called the free speech zone is one of about seven locations where outside groups can exercise freedom of speech.

But K-State students, faculty and staff have no limitations, Bosco said.

"The entire campus is a free speech area. That's what a university is about," Bosco said.

Bosco said he did not know when or why people started referring to the plaza area as the "free-speech zone" because there is no specific zone for free speech.

Simon said that although free speech can be practiced anywhere, the free-speech zone is ideal because of the high traffic.

"If students have the impression that's the only place they can spout off, they're wrong, but I'd still argue it's the best place to spout off."

Bosco said freedom of speech is sacred at K-State.

"That's part of the K-State spirit, and that's not going to go away," he said. "I understand there are difficulties at other campuses, but not here."

are hurting higher education."

But with one month until elections, Cook said it's difficult to get representatives to understand.

"The politicians aren't paying attention," he said. "Who's listening?"

The effects of increasing hours have not been assessed, but employees who work Friday nights and Saturday mornings were informed of the changes.

"We haven't had time to evaluate," Hobrock said. "We called in supervisors and asked them to do this."

Hobrock said he is happy he, along with the administration, can respond to student needs.

"If students really need this, these hours, why, this is something we could do," he said. "Students should always feel free to speak up. They can get things done. Otherwise, why are we here?"

However, Hobrock said that this will happen again.

"Everyone keeps saying fiscal year 2004 will be even more difficult than this," he said. "There is more uncertainty. We have to learn to deal with things differently than in the past."

1st American evacuees leave Ivory Coast

By Clar Ni Chonghaile
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

YAMOISSOUKRO, Ivory Coast — American schoolchildren flew to safety Thursday on the first evacuation plane out of rebellion-torn Ivory Coast, while French troops launched a full-scale evacuation of frightened Westerners from a rebel-held city under threat of imminent government attack.

A U.S. C-130 carried the first 18 evacuees — students age 8 to 18 from a mission boarding school and staff, most of them American — to an airport in neighboring Ghana, where U.S. Embassy workers whisked them away to rest and start arranging reunions with families.

Smiling broadly, the rescued American teens and younger children clutched water bottles as they crossed the tarmac toting bags of their belongings.

U.S. forces armed with assault rifles had flanked the children's military cargo plane when it left Ivory Coast — ending a week that saw teachers and children pinned down by rebel fire that at times came over the walls of their white-washed mission boarding school on the edge of the besieged city of Bouake.

"We were hunkered down for seven days waiting for help — then the French came," said Mike Coustineau, security chief for the U.S.-allied International Christian Academy. "We were very delighted to see them."

The first flight out came as U.S., French and British forces scrambled to bring all their nationals out of Bouake, a central city of 500,000 people that has been held by rebels since a failed Sept. 19 coup attempt.

As the evacuation got under way, Ivory Coast Defense Minister Lida Moise Kouassi took to state TV to declare Bouake and one other rebel-held city "war zones." He said attack was imminent.

Troops from France — the once-stable nation's colonial ruler — hammered out a cease-fire with rebels for the evacuation and rushed to clear the city of all who wished to go.

Hundreds of armed French troops in jeeps and at least one light tank secured the main roads out of Bouake.

Anxious evacuees lined the roads in cars, rolling out in convoys when the word to move out came.

Thousands of the Bouake's people fled on foot, walking the sides of the roads with bundles of belongings or cooking pots on their heads.

Rebels in camouflage uniforms manned checkpoints in and out the city. Shattered glass and other wreckage by some of the checkpoints testified to recent fighting.

Government troops secured the 40 mile route to a hastily erected reception center at the Ivory Coast capital, Yamoussoukro.

French and U.S. forces and diplomats of several European countries and Japan waited there to take in and process their nationals.

French forces said they expected Bouake to be emptied of all foreigners who wanted to leave by Friday.

The city is home to 650 French, an unknown number of other Europeans, and at least 150 Americans.

Unable or unwilling to flee, many of Bouake's Ivory Coast citizens huddled in their homes.

"Everyone is afraid," said one frightened Ivorian woman, reached by telephone Thursday.

to that situation."

My knowledge about parenthood is zero, but I would bet that cussing, yelling and harassing high school football officials is probably not acting as a responsible father.

Cheering on your children from the stands, showing them support in a calm demeanor and not making a fool of yourself would be more beneficial to them.

Young Tommy most likely isn't walking around the halls of Lawrence High beaming with pride about his father's behavior.

The University of Kansas athletic administration has to be real pleased right now, too.

Its football team has been schooled by a bad University of Nevada-Las Vegas team and drilled at home by Bowling Green.

The last thing they needed was bad press about their coach. Can you imagine the uproar around here if Bill Snyder was cussing out and heckling football officials at a Manhattan High School game?

Fortunately, we don't have to worry about that, as Snyder is one of the classiest coaches in football.

Later in the season, Snyder will give Mangino a lesson on the football field. Perhaps he should also give him a lesson in manners.

VOLLEYBALL | Cats to battle Texas on Saturday

On Wednesday, the Cats swept Iowa State, a young team that showed a lot of improvement from last year, outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said.

"Iowa State blocked well," Pollard said.

"Texas is big, and I think they will block well and be a physical presence at the net.

The match with Iowa State got us prepared to face Texas."

The Cyclones gave the Cats a scare in the third game of Wednesday's match, but K-State won 31-29 to sweep Iowa State for the 12th time in 13 meetings.

"We fought them off in that one," Fritz said. "We showed some nice composure in the match."

But Texas will be better, Pollard said.

She said K-State won't be able to make the mistakes they did against both Baylor and Iowa State if they expect to win Saturday.

"We'll definitely have to play better to beat Texas," Pollard said.

"We're looking forward to coming home and playing a quality opponent."

KURTIS | Journalist uses experience to revitalize small-town America

career was in his future. Kurtis' first big assignment was in Chicago, covering the riots following the assassination of Martin Luther King Jr. "I learned my first critical journalistic lesson," Kurtis said. "We had imposed a boycott on racially inflammatory information that we would not broadcast it, thinking that we would communicate a riot on the south side to the folks on the west side, and we would add fuel to the fire. "We were failing in the No. 1 obligation of a broadcaster. We were failing to warn people of the danger. I watch cars trying to come home, driving into mobs, drivers being pulled out and pummeled. The responsibility of a journalist is to call it as he sees it. If you are doing the right thing, you better be ready to make important calls. You have got to be strong." In 1969, Kurtis covered the 10-month murder trial of Charles Manson. He said he remembers Manson leaping on the defendant's table, grabbing a pen and lunging at the jury members. Manson's three female accomplices walked into the courtroom with Xs carved into their foreheads. Kurtis was able to use his law degree to go deeper into coverage of the trial. "You have to know your subject," he said. "Fortunately, I had a law degree. With that extra knowledge, I was able to see another dimension." Kurtis then served in the Vietnam War in 1975. When he got back, he continued his broadcasting career, when one day a plain vanilla envelope was laid on his desk. In it, a list of 12 names of Vietnam veterans who were exposed to Agent Orange, a defoliant used during warfare to clear jungle. All 12 were experiencing physical and psychological symptoms attributed to the exposure to Agent Orange. "I knew at this moment if we were using biological and chemical warfare on our own people that in fact it would change the nature of warfare," he said. Kurtis was the first American journalist to be allowed into Vietnam where he investigated the veterans' claims against chemical companies. He eventually testified before the armed services department, which in turn awarded millions of dollars to veterans. Despite Kurtis' success, he does have his regrets. With a tear rolling down his cheek, he told the story of a trip to Africa. While in Uganda, his crew got a call that local veterinarians had found an orphaned 400-lb. baby elephant. In a truck, Kurtis and his crew, along with veterinarians, searched for a pregnant mother who might take in the baby. After locating a mother with two babies of her own, the veterinarians pushed the baby elephant toward the mother. But, when the baby approached her, the mother threw it aside with her trunk. The baby came back to the group, the only family it knew. As the baby elephant nuzzled Kurtis' hand, he realized what was about to happen. "The baby had no where else to go," he said. "I look over at the veterinarian, and he was looking at the director. They were dealing with the most difficult decision a veterinarian ever has to make - life and death. "Putting a baby to sleep is more merciful than letting them go knowing the hyenas were going to get them." As they drove back to the headquarters, Kurtis reminded his crew to stay out of the situation and be objective journalists even though they were in pain. But he still has regrets when he remembers the syringe that put the baby elephant to sleep. "Not a day goes by that I don't wish I would have broken the rules that one time," he said. "I shouldn't intervene, I shouldn't interfere - you don't make the move. But you have to break the rules sometimes." Now, Kurtis continues his in-depth reporting through Kurtis Productions, which he founded in 1990. While anchoring three A&E series, Kurtis is on a quest to save small town America. He is now working to save Sedan, Kan. - population 75 - with a tourism center focused on his buffalo ranch and a replica of Laura Ingalls Wilder's cabin. He said small towns are being replaced by large corporations, and it is time for small town citizens to take a stand. "Communities need to wake up to the fact that they can fight back," he said. "I believe it's time for Kansas who have done well to come back and do good."

Goodson Joins Greek Affairs

There is a new addition to the Greek Affairs office this year. For the first time, we have an Assistant Greek Advisor working full-time in the Greek Affairs office. After a selection process that began last spring and lasted throughout the summer, Angie Goodson was named to the position.

Goodson received her Bachelor's of Science degree from Ohio Northern University in 1999 and her masters in Student Affairs Administration from Ball State University. She has worked as a national consultant for Delta Zeta sorority and held various volunteer positions including Chapter Advisor, Housing Corporation President, and National New Member Education Coordinator.

Goodson works tediously in the office to provide assistance to the Greek Community. She is currently working as the advisor for this year's All-Greek Philanthropy Up 'Til Dawn to benefit St. Jude Children's Research Hospital, as well as holding regular meetings with all chapter presidents and the executive boards of the Inter-Fraternity Council and Panhellenic Council. We encourage all of you to visit Angie in the Greek Affairs office. She is a valuable resource to Greeks and continues to amaze all of us with her commitment to the K-State campus.

Greek Of The Month

On behalf of the entire Kansas State University Greek community, we would like to congratulate Darcie Brownback for being September's Greek of the Month recipient! Darcie is a junior member of Alpha Xi Delta sorority and is majoring in Family Studies/Human Services/Social Work/Pre-Law with a 3.849 GPA. She currently serves as the chapter's Academic Achievement Chair. She has worked on such activities as personal goal GPA's, a scholarship dinner, and a study hours program to benefit various members of her chapter.

Outside of her sorority, Darcie keeps very busy by being involved in many organizations. She says that community service is very important to her and she shows that by donating her time to Big Brothers/Big Sisters. She has worked closely with two different children, has assisted with the Bowl for Kid's Sake fundraiser, and has gotten seven of her friends involved with the program. Another program that Darcie participates in is the Hugh O'Brien Youth Leadership Seminar (HOBY). She got involved in this organization as a camper during her sophomore year of high school and has continued since, evolving from a junior counselor to the current Discussion Dinner Chair. Through this organization, she has logged over three hundred hours of unpaid volunteer hours, but says that it is all worth it when she gets to see change in action and see how the program helps other young teenagers. Darcie is also an ambassador for the college of Human Ecology. In addition to being this month's Greek of the Month, Darcie has received many other awards including: being a Putnam Scholar for Kansas State University, an initiated member of Kappa Omicron Nu, a Human Ecology Dean's scholar, the recipient of the Hugh O'Brien Volunteer Award, recipient of the Kansas 4-H Key Award, a Governor's Scholar and a National 4-H Conference Representative. After college, Darcie plans on attending law school and specializing in family and children's rights. She eventually wants to become a lawyer and social worker and work for the betterment of the disadvantaged.

As you can see, Darcie Brownback is an exemplary Kansas State University student and Greek community member. We again want to congratulate Darcie on being September's Greek of the Month award recipient and to thank her for her wonderful contributions to our overall student body!

Terror list grows

Egyptian visitors to be questioned on arrival to U.S.

By Rawya Rageh
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — The United States on Sunday began advising Egyptians traveling to America they may be fingerprinted, photographed and questioned on arrival in America for reasons of national security.

So far, the program requiring registration of foreign visitors included those from Iran, Iraq, Sudan and Libya — the countries listed by the State Department as state sponsors of terrorism.

According to an Immigration and Naturalization Service memo obtained by The Associated Press earlier this week, the program was expanded to include men ages 16 to 45 from Saudi Arabia, Pakistan and Yemen, starting Oct. 1.

The U.S. Embassy in Cairo said in a press release "the new system will require the digital fingerprinting and photographing of selected (Egyptian) travelers upon arrival in the United States, as well as responses to questions posed by immigration officials."

An Egyptian Foreign Ministry official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the United States has the right to

Comedian performs tonight

UPC officials excited to bring big-name talent to K-State

By Kennis Look
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Students requested big-name acts, and the Union Program Council delivered.

Lewis Black, stand-up comedian, will entertain students at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Students may recognize Black from his satirical commentaries on Comedy Central's "The Daily Show."

Mark Threton, UPC graduate program adviser, said he was excited about scheduling a famous performer.

"We were looking for a big event, and we wanted to bring a bigger name to one of our programs," Threton said.

In regards to Black's stand-up material, Threton said, "I think he gears everything towards the college-aged audience. I think he'll draw in a lot of people."

In addition to Black's Wednesday night appearances on "The Daily Show," he also has performed stand-up comedy for many years.

"He's a big-time comedian to perform for K-State," he said. Bill Harlan, senior in agriculture education and special

Family Day 2002 provides activities to promote college

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

Sarah Voegeli's family hadn't seen her residence hall room since she moved in a month ago.

"My family hadn't been up here to see my room, and I wanted my brothers and sisters to see it," Voegeli, freshman in kinesiology, said.

Family Day 2002 provided Voegeli's family from Wichita a chance to come and see her in her new college environment.

"It is really nice to see her so happy," Darla Voegeli, Sarah's mother, said.

The Union Program Council sponsored Family Day on Saturday, and it included events that allowed families to explore students' new homes.

"Family Day is heavily weighted toward freshman parents because it is a great opportunity for the parents to come on campus after their son or daughter has been here, just to see them again," said Maxine Jevons, Union Program Council office assistant.

The day started off with a Cat Carnival, which included games and food, and continued with the Beyond Oz Family Open House at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art. Tours of the K-State University Gardens also were available.

"We went to the carnival, and the kids got to play mini golf. They really enjoyed that," Darla said.

Sarah showed her family members around campus so they could see her new surroundings.

"It is nice to see the most friendly environment, plus the beautiful campus," Darla said.

Family Weekend, now Family Day, has been a tradition since the early 1980s.

The annual event used to be in conjunction with home football weekends. However, when K-State football games began to sell out, it was difficult to guarantee tickets for participating families, Jevons said.

Last year was the first year Family Day was on a volleyball gameday instead of football — a trend that continued this year.

Admission to the game against the University of Texas was free with a Family Day postcard.

Sarah said she thought Family Day was a good idea because it allowed families to see what students do at K-State.

"It's a little odd because you're not used to seeing them," she said. "You feel like you have to entertain them, but all we really do is sleep."

Hooblers recognized as university's 2002 family of year

Student writes essay to honor family, thank them for support

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

After her two older sisters graduated from K-State, Tina Hoobler, senior in agricultural economics, said she decided it was time to give her parents some much-deserved credit.

Hoobler and her family were named the 2002 Honorary Family during Saturday's Family Day celebration. Hoobler wrote the winning essay in the Honorary Family competition, which was sponsored by the junior honorary Chimes.

"This is something my two older sisters and I have always wanted to do," Tina said. "It sounded nice to thank them for support while I was in college."

Tina's father, Larry, has been involved in a number of university activities ever since he was a K-State student 30 years ago.

Larry received his bachelor's degree in 1970 and a master's degree in agricultural education in 1976. He also assisted in supervising K-State student teachers and worked with the agricultural education facility.

Although the university population is large, Larry said he has enjoyed getting to know a number of students on a personal level through his daughters.

"Even though there are thousands of students and parents involved at this university, we've been able to meet a lot of our daughters' friends, and it's been special," he said.

His wife, Diane, also has been actively involved with the university, including having a role in the K-State Research and Extension programs through the Riley County 4-H organization.

"This award was totally unexpected," Larry said. "We think it's the highest honor we've had. I've had a lot of respect for the families that have won this award in previous years."

His wife agreed, adding the university fully supports the student body and the role of families in their lives.

"There are so many other parents who are deserving of this award," Diane said.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Former Tyco International executive hides uncontrollable spending habits

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

Among personal items that former Tyco International Chief Executive L. Dennis Kozlowski bought and charged to the company — without authorization, said the company in September — were two New York City apartments ($24 million), a Boca Raton, Fla., house ($29 million), furnishings and renovations ($14 million), a travel toiletries box ($17,000), an umbrella stand ($15,000), a shower curtain ($6,000) and a pincushion ($445), along with half the $2.1 million tab for a 40th birthday party for his wife.

The National Post reported in August on the $12,000 executive seminars given by the local management firm Case Solutions, centering around its clients' using customized Lego blocks to build quixotic designs as metaphors for their companies' opportunities and problems. For example, one executive made an octopus with a hard hat holding a skeleton to show himself as a multi-tasker. The hard hat supposedly represented problems from the past, wrote the Post, while the skeleton was said to symbolize his tendency to protect himself from sales quotas. Said one Lego fan, "(People) use the Legos to make a statement that they might not have been able to make before."

Democracy in action

And the district attorney in Oshkosh, Wis., Joe Paulus, was beaten in the September primary after an audio tape surfaced of him bragging he had had sex in his office with five women. And the German Green party, which provided the margin of victory for Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder in September, drew 8 percent of the vote with such campaign billboards as the one for gay rights featuring a male couple and a female couple holding their respective partners' nipples.

Compelling explanations

In August, a jury in Sarasota, Fla., awarded a 59-year-old woman $2.1 million from surgeon Holly Barbour for a faulty face-lift and neck-lift. According to testimony, Barbour had offered the patient a discount operation because Barbour had previously worked only on eyes and wanted to expand her practice to faces. Barbour's surgery took 10 hours (twice the norm) and left the patient with a lump on her face that made a popping sound when she blinked.
Vince Dominach, the county economic development director in Easton, Pa., who was in trouble in June for $1,388 worth of personal calls on his government phone, told reporters the problem stemmed from a hectic period in which his wife and he had become sexually involved with another couple. And Jeremiah Frank Dubois, 24, pleaded guilty to rape in August in Raleigh, N.C. Police said he told them the reason he did it was that his wedding day was approaching, and he wanted one last fling before then.

Raymond Leopold, who was the "Winston man" model in cigarette ads from 1978 to 1980, filed a federal lawsuit in Little Rock, Ark., in April, demanding $65 million from R.J. Reynolds because he is so torn up with remorse and stress at the role he played in creating smoking-related illnesses in people who were influenced by his ads.

Former University of Hong Kong graduate architecture student Francis Frick, 34, said in May he would resist being sent back to the United States, despite the school's having kicked him out for lack of progress. As his Ph.D. dissertation last year, Frick submitted a blank piece of paper, calling it an example of his "quantum arcology," which focuses on nonverbal creativity. He plans a legal challenge to the school because his adviser failed to understand Frick's approach.

All in the family

White supremacists Leo Felton, 31, and his girlfriend Erica Chase, 22, were convicted in July of plotting to blow up landmarks around Boston that had significance for Jews and blacks so that a "racial holy war" would erupt. Chase dressed demurely during the trial, hiding her numerous Aryan tattoos. Felton has attributed his aggression to his black father, and courthouse observers speculated Chase's distancing of herself from him during the trial reflects her growing ambivalence about his heritage.

Least competent criminals

No Exit Strategy: David Christopher Lander, 51, was arrested in Gainesville, Fla., in July, locked inside the Infiniti car he was burglarizing. While inside, he had accidentally triggered the car alarm, which automatically locks the doors. And in September, Andrew Birch, 21, was arrested in Renfrew, Scotland, after becoming wedged in the window of the car he was climbing through in order to steal.

Trademark blues

In August, a federal judge in New York rejected the Tommy Hilfiger company's lawsuit against the makers of Timmy Holedigger perfume for dogs, which Hilfiger had said was a threat to its trademark in that consumers were likely to confuse the two products.

Our civilization in decline

Lutheran minister David Benke, the main voice on the church's national radio show, was demoted in June solely because he spoke at an all-denomination prayer service in New York City just after Sept. 11. Lutherans are strictly against praying with "pagans" because that would imply there is more than one God. And ex-con and illegal Iranian immigrant Peyman Bahadori, who works as a private investigator in Colorado Springs and who was pursuing another Iranian man, was charged with impersonating an immigration agent after he harassed the man in August. Bahadori somehow persuaded four Aurora, Colo., police officers to help him in his pursuit of the man.

U.N. inspectors begin talks

Discussion to center around return to Iraq

By Dafna Linzer
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UNITED NATIONS — U.N. weapons inspectors, who on Monday will lay down demands to Iraq about getting back into the country, may not get the unfettered access demanded by the United States unless the Security Council alters a deal made in 1998.

The inspectors are dusting off old equipment, ordering helicopters and testing new technology as the United States negotiates a new proposal for their return.

The Bush administration dismissed Iraq's offer earlier this month to accept the inspectors' unconditional return under previous U.N. resolutions. Instead, it wants a tough new resolution completely redesigning the inspections regime and the powers inspectors would have to enter Saddam Hussein's palaces, block his movements and break in on closed facilities during their hunt for weapons.

Hans Blix, the chief U.N. weapons inspector, and Jacques Baute, the head of the International Atomic Energy Agency's nuclear team, on Monday begin two days of talks with Iraqi experts to arrange for the inspectors' return.

The Iraqis are supposed to bring a backlog of reports listing items they possess that could have military purposes. The lists must disclose the locations and uses for those items.

"We're certainly aware of what happened last time," said Melissa Fleming, spokeswoman for the Vienna-based IAEA. "But we uncovered Iraq's secret nuclear program, and we dismantled it. If we get unfettered access, we will be successful again."

Although they have not been inside Iraq since December 1998, international inspectors are certain Iraq has a biological weapons program.

Some experts also believe that, despite 12 years of sanctions in place since Iraq invaded Kuwait and lobbed Scud missiles at Israel and Saudi Arabia, Saddam is ready to build a nuclear bomb if he gets enough weapons-grade uranium or plutonium.

Britain said last week that Iraq has a growing arsenal of chemical and biological weapons capable of being launched within 45 minutes. Washington also has claimed Iraq has ties to Osama bin Laden's al-Qaeda terror network.

But unless they are on the ground, inspectors say there is no way to know just how quickly Iraq is resuscitating its programs.

When U.N. inspectors first arrived in Baghdad in the aftermath of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, they were a powerful, almost untouchable force.

Helped by hundreds of cameras and air sniffers installed at more than 750 sites, they got Iraq to admit to a biological weapons program and were able to monitor materials that could be used for military purposes.

But the operation began to unravel by 1996 as Iraq and the inspections teams faced off over access and transparency. Inspectors accused Iraq of violating resolutions and refusing to cooperate with inspections.

The Iraqis accused inspectors of the same, pointing to wording in resolutions calling on monitors to respect the country's sovereignty.

The inspectors also complained they were spied on while Iraq claimed the entire operation was a front for U.S. intelligence.

In an effort to keep the operation afloat and avoid another war in Iraq, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan cut a deal with Baghdad in early 1998 restricting inspectors' access to eight so-called presidential sites encompassing a total of 12 square miles.

The United States and the rest of the Security Council endorsed the plan but, within weeks, the inspectors said they were finding very little other than frustration. After months of cat-and-mouse games, Saddam sent the entire team packing in November 1998.

Then, after a brief return to Baghdad, the inspectors reported Iraqi noncompliance and left the country in December 1998 ahead of punishing U.S. and British airstrikes.

Since then, many former inspectors have maintained that the only way to disarm Iraq would be to reinstate some of the inspectors' earlier freedoms.

U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, say their proposal does just that by nullifying the restrictions on presidential sites.

Saddam would have seven days to agree to the terms of the resolution or face military action. He would then have another 23 days to report his entire arsenal, under the proposal.

The draft resolution would then authorize inspectors to designate "no-fly" and "no-drive" zones around areas scheduled for inspection.

The resolution also would end the Iraqi practice of assigning government guides to accompany inspectors.

Much of the U.S. draft resolution is based on a position paper written in August by the Washington-based Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. A critical element of the endowment's paper calls for the Bush administration to forswear unilateral military action as long as Iraq appears to be complying with inspections.

The draft resolution, written in Washington with British support, has not yet been made public but details were disclosed Friday while the administration lobbied for support from France, Russia and China — the other permanent members of the Security Council who oppose threatening force before inspectors return.

More than 1,700 visit Konza Prairie for biennial event highlighting area

Visitors allowed to explore, learn about prairie

By Patrice Holderbach
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With a 7-foot bull snake coiled around her body, she welcomed visitors to the Konza Prairie by inviting them to touch the yellow and black scales.

"I'd rather you didn't hold his head," Eva Horne, assistant professor of biology, said. "Here, you can touch the back part of him."

The biennial Konza Prairie Visitors Day on Saturday attracted 1,700 people.

Among the first to arrive for the festivities, Sharon Weidman brought her family from Olathe, Kan. Megan Weidman, a sophomore at Olathe South High School, toted a camera in hopes of photographing wildlife and scenery for her 4-H club. Her mother, Sharon, said the family had looked forward to the event since they moved from Texas.

"We've been wanting to come out here for several years but never made it due to other circumstances," Sharon said. "I just want to see the natural, the untouched."

John Whitehouse, Weidman's grandfather, said he enjoyed experiencing the prairie terrain, much different from his home in Pennsylvania's Pocono Mountains.

"I'm interested in conservation," Whitehouse said. "I wanted to see what is here. I'm used to the mountains and forests, so I'm interested in what's happening in the prairie. It's totally different."

Dr. Gary Jeffrey, Konza Prairie docent, said visitors would see grasses at the prairie that are endangered in the United States but common in Argentina, Russia and Asia.

He yanked one of 600 species of flora from the ground as he led hikers up a walking trail.

"This is blue gramma, which is not to be confused with a sad grandma," Jeffrey said.

Inside the historic stone barn, researchers displayed work and answered questions. Ryan Rehmeier, graduate student in biology, showed visitors the small mammals he traps for study at the prairie.

"They ask a lot of strange questions, like 'How can I catch a skunk without getting sprayed?'" You get feedback from the rest of the crowd, but it's usually a recipe for disaster," Rehmeier said. "I'd still like to see people try to catch one."

He said visitors also expressed curiosity about the research projects.

"People are just generally interested in what we're doing. It's just because so many people have great interest in mammals," Rehmeier said. "People assume they know a lot about mammals, and they find out whether or not that's true at these things."

In addition to testing their knowledge, visitors took two-hour van or bus rides, which brought them close to bison and other wildlife. Chris Smith, professor of biology, led a group that spotted a peregrine falcon. Smith said sighting the bird was an unusual occurrence at Konza.

Visitors could also take a one-hour hay wagon ride. Terri Mangiaracino, administrative specialist for grain science and industry, explained the prairie's dynamic ecosystem to visitors settled on haystacks.

"It is amazing how many people can live so close by and not even realize it's out here," Mangiaracino said.

In the driver's seat, Joe Gelbroth said he had worked with Konza for 29 years.

He said the program's success was made possible by individual efforts within the docent program, which allows volunteers to go through a training program, and educate visitors about the prairie.

More than 100 volunteers from the community and university helped throughout the day. For Gelbroth, Visitors Day serves as a reunion with other docents.

"It's also fun just to talk to people. A lot of people who are new to Manhattan, like freshmen, wonder what's so exciting about this thing that doesn't grow many trees," Gelbroth said. "It's fun to see them explore it. You can come out here every two years and learn something new."

TO THE POINT Colbert's dream coming true with local event

On March 18, 1997, Jim Colbert said, "To get K-State to be the first one of the PGA collegiate courses is a big feat. It will be the best thing that could happen to the city and the university at the same time."

On that same day, Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement, said, "From a university standpoint, I think it could have a significant impact on visibility for K-State and on the region."

We agree.

The Jim Colbert Intercollegiate golf tournament begins today at Colbert Hills Golf Course, and we all have the opportunity to support something that brings funds to our community.

Incoming revenue for hotels and restaurants will benefit both K-State and the city of Manhattan. People from Manhattan supporting this event will show outsiders we have pride in what goes on in our community.

Colbert's dream is coming true, but it can only happen if people are willing to acknowledge that Manhattan has a top-rate course, able to be host to the greatest golfers around.

Colbert's goal was to play host to events like this tournament, and the possibility of fulfilling that objective will be accomplished with the backing of students and Manhattan residents.

No PLACE Like HOME

Jardine: a welcoming garden

Jardine: un jardín acogedor

Editor's note: Lorena is pursuing a doctoral degree in the area of curriculum & instruction. Every Monday, she will tackle an issue in her native language, Spanish, as well as English. Gloria Freeland, associate professor of journalism, edits the columns for correctness and clarity. Both columns convey the same message and allow the Collegian to reach a more diverse audience. Lorena is a graduate student in curriculum and instruction. You can e-mail her at lorena@ksu.edu.

LORENA BARBOZA

For two years, I have had a home in K-State's Jardine Apartment Complex. It is comfortable with enough space to make a cozy living with one or two relatives. Here it is important community residents keep this relationship at the highest level possible.

The atmosphere at the complex is a community environment, and each of us neighbors, culturally, linguistically and ethnically diverse, try hard to build a peaceful and dignified common living area. The administration contributes to create this positive environment by listening to our suggestions and ideas to improve the place and keeping their areas and offices open to listen to any complaint and to solve any problem.

Jardine's main purpose is to provide comfortable, attractive, safe and affordable housing for students. The management does anything in its hands to develop an atmosphere favorable to academic work, encourage responsible living, provide support services for the community members, be respectful to the cultural diversity and enhance the communal life.

Residents here are full-time students, married couples, students with families, single graduate students, nontraditional undergraduate students, visiting guest faculty and staff. Everyone who needs a good place to live and is willing to abide by the terms of the contract and rules of the complex, is welcome here.

The complex was created in 1957 and named Jardine Terrace in honor of K-State's seventh president, William Jardine.

In 1985, the day-care center was built, and today is able to house 200 children between 12 months and 12 years old, and there are playgrounds, picnic tables, barbecues, hydrants, a softball field, and basketball and volleyball courts.

In here there is a little United Nations community, with neighbors from Central America, India, China, Japan, Korea, Mexico, Brazil, Europe — everybody from everywhere in the world. Because of the great number of residents, the administration has an efficient Internet communication listserv. A monthly newsletter is distributed with recommendations about the weather and activities going on in the place. Activities are organized consistently inside or outside the complex for all residents to participate in and enjoy a good, safe time. Some examples: tours, canoe trips, museums and stadium visits.

Payments on time, use of parking permits, monitoring of the admitted residents, cleanliness and low levels of noise are mandatory. There is a permanent control of insects, sexual harassment and safety.

Every semester, the complex offers a very valuable and useful free tutoring program in math, sciences and other subjects for young students in the complex who might need a helping hand.

I really like this place. I feel safe and surrounded by an ordered and nice environment. I miss perhaps some more interaction among the residents. We residents should make an effort to enhance our lives and take advantage of the opportunity to share our cultures and national identities in harmony and peace.

Por dos años he vivido en uno de los apartamentos del Complejo Habitacional Jardine de Kansas State. Aunque no lujoso, sí es cómodo y suficientemente grande para vivir con uno o dos familiares.

En este lugar se busca la benevolencia de los residentes de la comunidad mantener esa buena relación al máximo nivel posible.

La atmósfera en Jardine es la de una comunidad en la que cada uno de los vecinos cultural, lingüística y étnicamente diverso, trata de construir un ambiente pacífico y digno.

La administración contribuye a crear ese ambiente positivo, escuchando nuestras sugerencias e ideas para mejorar el lugar, y manteniendo las áreas y oficinas abiertas para oír quejas y resolver cualquier problema.

El principal propósito de Jardine es proveer hospedaje confortable, atractivo y seguro a los estudiantes. Sus administradores hacen cualquier cosa para desarrollar una atmósfera favorable al trabajo académico, animar al convivio responsable, proveer servicios de apoyo a los miembros de la comunidad, respeto a la diversidad cultural y realizar la vida comunitaria.

Quiénes vivimos aquí somos estudiantes de tiempo completo, parejas de esposos o estudiantes con familia, estudiantes graduados solteros, estudiantes no tradicionales, profesores visitantes y empleados del complejo.

Aquí todo aquel que necesite un buen lugar para vivir y esté dispuesto a cumplir con los términos del contrato, es bienvenido.

El complejo nació en 1957 pero en honor a William Jardine, séptimo presidente de la Universidad, en 1966 los apartamentos fueron nombrados Jardine Terrace.

En 1985 construyeron la guardería de infantes que hoy tiene capacidad para cuidar casi 200 niños en edades entre los 12 meses y 12 años, y además hay áreas de playground, mesas de picnic, asadores, hidrantes, y canchas de fútbol, basketbol y voleybol.

Aquí hay una comunidad en pequeña escala representativa de la Organización de las Naciones Unidas, con vecinos de América Central, India, China, Japón, Corea, México, Brasil, europeo — gente de todas partes del mundo.

Debido a la gran cantidad de residentes, la administración tiene un eficiente sistema de comunicación a través de internet.

También cada mes envía un boletín con recomendaciones acerca del clima y actividades diversas que son ofrecidas en el lugar.

Constantemente organizan eventos en el mismo complejo o fuera de él, para que todos — adultos y niños podamos participar en un ambiente seguro y familiar.

Algunos ejemplos son: excursiones, viajes en canoa, visitas a museos, al estadio...

Eso sí, son estrictos en que se hagan los pagos a tiempo, se use el estacionamiento con el respectivo permiso, vivan en los apartamentos solo los residentes admitidos, la no tenencia de mascotas, aseo de los apartamentos y los niveles de sonido.

Fumigan para prevenir la aparición de bichos, resguardan del acoso sexual y mantienen seguridad en la zona.

Cada semestre, ofrecen gratuitamente un valioso programa de tutoría en matemáticas, ciencias y otras materias para los niños y jóvenes estudiantes que viven en Jardine y pueden necesitar ayuda.

Realmente me gusta este lugar. Me siento segura y rodeada de un ambiente agradable y ordenado. Extraño, sin embargo, un poco más de interacción entre los vecinos.

Todos los que habitamos en Jardine debemos hacer un esfuerzo para mejorar nuestras vidas y aprovechar la oportunidad para compartir nuestra cultura e identidad en armonía y paz.

America's resources could be better utilized

I had sex, too, and now I'm having a baby.

To all the senators who couldn't make it to Salina: We're on Wefald's plane having our third drink. Have a good night.

What is more logical: life evolving over millions of years, or an immaterial being creating everything and leaving absolutely no trace of existence?

To the person who called about having only one language in this country: God didn't create just English-speaking people. He created all of us with different languages so the world would be more diverse. You need to open your eyes and see how beautiful the world is.

I thought my girlfriend and her best friend were really cute, always having sleepovers and stuff — until this one day she said she was attracted to her and might be a lesbian.

In life, only one thing is inevitable: stuff.

This is an athletic classroom report: Pervis Pasco attended Mass Communication in Society.

Hear that hissing sound? That's the sprinklers out here in Salina watering the sidewalks. Wefald must have been here.

To the person who called in about the articles printed in English and Spanish: You need to realize when you speak more than one language, that makes you a more intelligent person. Why don't you just give different cultures a chance? Don't be so negative and narrow-minded.

I'm all for diversity, but how am I supposed to learn anything from a teacher who doesn't speak freaking English?

To the guy who thought he set the record of four quotes in the Fourum: I had eight on Sept. 23. Thank you, brother.

If Nicole Ohlde and Pervis Pasco got married, you could call them old pervs.

So I got drunk and jumped off somebody's furniture. How many times do I have to apologize?

Girls who join sororities are compensating for something they don't have — friends.

My mom makes me hot Jell-O, too. Moms are the greatest.

Just because you're dating a greek doesn't mean you get to be a greek. Sorry. Why don't you try rushing next time?

You ever heard of Iraq — the country with possibly the largest-known oil reserves on the planet that your president wants to invade unilaterally?

News flash: For more than a year before seeking Congressional approval this administration has been moving ahead with plans for World War III.

Targets: Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran, Yemen and any other oil-producer that doesn't give us the Monica Lewinsky reach-around treatment.

We used Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in 1991 as a pretext to kill 300,000 Iraqis and cripple their infrastructure. But aren't we the ones who are about to invade a country this time? One which incidentally has done nothing wrong to us and poses no immediate threat to our security?

A $200 billion annual price tag, and for what exactly? So what if Iraq has broken 16 U.N. resolutions? Does anyone realize the countless number the United States knowingly violates? It's more than 16.

What about Israel's 80-plus violations since 1967? They, coincidentally, are recipients of the largest amounts of U.S. foreign aid.

We've been spending money like there was no tomorrow, because there might not be. How about instead of putting decent men and women in harm's way, we round up all the suits from oil companies to fight?

The majority of ex-CIA directors, high-ranking generals, former U.N. weapons inspectors, world leader, as well as the majority of the war team from Gulf Invasion I, are all echoing bluntly: There is absolutely nothing in U.S. or international law that allows what our nation is about to do.

Initiate peace by creating an unending war? Everything the authors of our Constitution — the only patriots I know of — fought for have already been altered by this tyrant.

During World War I and II, the Great Powers wanted to gain territory in order to have their influences interspersed worldwide.

This new policy of the president's was more original when Adolph Hitler, Napoleon and Genghis Khan used it to dominate and colonize territory that wasn't theirs.

So let's just be naively unified and continue to let the blind lead the blind.

CLASH OF CULTURES

Rednecks abound in new movie"SWEET HOME ALABAMA"

Movie review By JJ Duncan

Hollywood decided the world needed a few more rednecks and called up Reese Witherspoon.

So send the notorious blonde into the Deep South with a gang of affable hicks, just add some Skynyrd, and hey presto, you've got a movie.

"Sweet Home Alabama" is exactly what the previews made it out to be. A poor screenplay, a few recognizable faces and liberal use of the song the movie took its name from make this a box-office draw for the same people who watch Nascar and go to rodeos.

Wow, that means it should make some serious cash in Kansas.

All jabbing aside, "Sweet Home Alabama" is the kind of mediocre romantic comedy that's simply enjoyable if you're in the right mood and you have an affinity for Jeff Foxworthy.

It isn't terrible, but that's the best that can be said about it.

Melanie (Witherspoon) is a successful clothing designer in New York, engaged to the mayor's JFK-Jr-ish son. She goes back home to Alabama to tell her parents she's getting married and finalize her divorce with the man she is still technically married to, Jake (Josh Lucas).

Of course then the movie becomes this big battle of which lifestyle and which guy she likes more.

Will she choose a successful career in New York with her GQ fiancée? Or will she choose southern rock, civil war reenactments and the local pool hall with her rugged redneck husband?

It seems strange Witherspoon would take this role after such strong performances as those in "Election," "Pleasantville" and last year's unexpected hit "Legally Blonde." She has a knack for making funny movies out of plots that sound plain stupid.

Her charm doesn't carry this film.

Fortunately, the movie is made slightly funnier by its one-dimensional characters. The rednecks are such caricatures that they can't help but have some comic merit. Mullet-redneck, Ditz-redneck, Cop-redneck, even Gay-redneck are all there in the pool hall, beer in hand.

It's a gimmick, but it's a gimmick that works. Even Witherspoon's father is a caricature, taking off on the weekends to fight in civil war reenactments.

The problem is you get the impression that none of the writers have ever seen an episode of "Cops." Not all hicks can be lovable, hard-working, blue collar beer drinkers.

"Sweet Home Alabama," is a cute movie, but it doesn't have any merit beyond that.

Artist would have benefited from longer break between releases

Adams' slimmed-down album offers simple-minded tunes; acoustic ballads entertain

Ryan Adams has been busy selling Gap jeans and dating actresses, but he found time to get a new album released exactly 365 days after his last.

Adams' 2001 LP "Gold" found its way onto many critics' lists for best album of the year.

After an achievement like that, many artists would be content to take some time off for rest and reflection, but Adams' endeavors grow exponentially.

His new album, "Demolition," was originally planned to be released as a four-disc, 60-track behemoth.

Luckily, someone convinced Adams that when an artist constructs an album, there are more things to consider than quantity of material, such as the artist's fan base's purchasing power and attention span.

The now-condensed, 13-track album features songs from a number of different recording sessions following the completion of "Gold."

These songs were recorded to be used as demos — note the title's play on words. It's questionable if a group of highly mastered recordings by an established artist can truly be classified as a demo, but you have to give him credit for defying the term's conventional interpretation.

Minimalist acoustic ballads make up the most poignant portion of the album.

Adams strips many of the songs down to a bare foundation of vocals, guitar and sometimes a little piano.

The simplicity of songs like "She Wants to Play Hearts" and "Cry on Demand" accentuate Adams' vocals but tend to sound insipid after a while.

Adams' ballads culminate in their bittersweet best during "Tomorrow," a duet with Gillian Welch.

Welch's accompaniment dissolves into Adams' lead, creating the album's most delicate and cordial sound.

The rock songs are not as imaginative as the country-flavored tracks. More often than not, they sound like the Goo Goo Dolls with a steel guitar. The tracks "Nuclear," "Tennessee Sucks" and "Gimme a Sign" would fit in with the most prefabricated of Top-40 radio.

Adams does manage to rock when backed by his cow-punk band, the Pink Hearts, on "Starting to Hurt."

The raspy vocals and aggressive guitar are remarkably similar to California's pre-emo experts Knapsack.

"Demolition" has a fair amount of impressive material, but it also has its share of flops.

Adams would probably do well to take a little bit more time between albums and concentrate on refining songs instead of writing new ones.

Album review By Adam Lee

Williams' dark side intriguing;
'One Hour Photo' worth seeing

It shouldn't come as a surprise that Robin Williams can portray a demented character with skill.

If you think about it, Williams has always been a freak. From the space-egg inhabiting Mork to the teacher with questionably pedophile-like qualities in "Dead Poets Society," Williams has brought a sort of sickness to all of his roles.

In "One Hour Photo," Williams finally gets a chance to take full advantage of his own abnormality, and boy is he creepy.

Sy's passion for his job spawns from the fact it's the only thing filling the desolate void that is his life. With no family or real friends of his own, Sy combats his loneliness by living his life through other people's pictures.

Sy's favorite customers are the Yorkins, an American family torn straight out of a magazine. The Yorkins have been developing their film at SavMart for years, and Sy has seen all the family events, both at work and at home.

Sy's voyeurism is out of control. He has made a duplicate print of every one of the Yorkins' photos, which he keeps for himself. Sy mounts the photos on a wall in his apartment, creating his own distorted monument to American domesticity. It is obvious Sy's little study won't remain passive for long.

"ONE HOUR PHOTO"

Most of "One Hour Photo" is based on visual content, and that is fitting, considering the photographic theme. The film's ability to make the viewer feel unsettled relies largely on its cinematography. The sterile depiction of Sy's workplace with its spotless floors and perfectly stocked shelves lit by ghostly fluorescence make it clear that something's rotten in the state of SavMart.

This is writer/director Mark Romanek's first feature film in 14 years. Romanek is best known for directing music videos such as Nine Inch Nails' "Closer" and Madonna's "Bedtime Stories." While "One Hour Photo" marks an outstanding re-entry into the field, Romanek needs a little practice.

By focusing on telling the story through images, Romanek limits the amount of character development that would make this movie great. Sy gets a pretty thorough study, to the point that the sociopath elicits sympathy, but the Yorkin family never comes off as more than a prop.

Perhaps that was Romanek's intention, but his film lacks the voice to convey such an idea effectively.

Colbert Hills Golf Course is now growing its rough, which is usually kept at four inches.

Men's golf hopes to continue success of first 2 tournaments at Jim Colbert Intercollegiate

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The men's golf team will compete in a more comfortable atmosphere today when team members tee off at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

"Obviously we're proud of our facility," Coach Tim Norris said. "I think that's part of having a tournament, so our players can show some of the rest of the teams across the country what they play every day. So, we're looking forward to the opportunity."

Playing on a course they practice on every day has its advantages, but Norris said the weather conditions could have a lot to do with the outcome.

"We won't know until Tuesday afternoon," he said. "I think they feel like they have an advantage, especially on a windy day. If the wind blows, I think there is an advantage."

If it's calm, it's a very scoreable golf course.

"I'm looking for some low scores if the conditions stay fairly calm. That's a good thing, though. I'm sure we could set it up so it would be a real chore to break 80, but that's not fun for anybody — the home team or the visitors."

Norris said K-State's knowledge and practice time could be key in the team's performance — an asset he wishes it could have at every tournament.

"We've been practicing to these pin placements for a couple of weeks," he said. "That's part of hosting a home event. There won't be any secrets. They know where everything is going to be."

"Every time we go to an away event, we get one practice round. We've got five guys playing together just trying to

Colbert Hills to challenge collegiate golfers' skills, tools

By Michael Watson
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The rough at Colbert Hills Golf Course is usually kept a little shorter, but for the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate tournament today and Tuesday, it has been grown out.

There are only a few golf courses more challenging than Colbert Hills, but the 4-inch-tall grass will make this course even more difficult, said Matt Gibson, first assistant golf professional at Colbert.

"Golfers will have to pick their shots," he said. "There are a lot of shots where you have to play smart, and if you are not shooting accurately, your ball will find trouble.

"At Colbert, there are no flat lies, the fairways are sloped and the greens are really tricky," Gibson said. "Where the pins are set, the players are going to have to shoot the perfect shot."

There are a lot of different ways to play each hole at Colbert Hills. It just depends on how aggressive players want to be, Gibson said.

Jim Colbert and Jeffrey Brauer designed this course to be an upscale public course for friendly play, as well as a course capable of playing host to collegiate competitions.

Coach Tim Norris said that because it is such a tough course with many possible ways to play each hole, discovering the best way takes several seasons.

He said he hopes that will give the Wildcats the edge today and Tuesday.

"We've been able to play the course many times in different conditions," he said. "It's our home course, so we will have a little bit of an edge over opponents."

He said there's not one hole on the course that players can fall asleep on, and the Wildcats know to keep focused.

One of the more demanding holes will be No. 11, a 230-yard par 3.

That's the only hole K-State has not

See COURSE Page 7

One tough course

The Kansas Golf Association rated Colbert Hills a 77.5/slope 152. That means a golfer who shoots an even par 72 should expect to shoot an average of 77.5 at this course.

The slope factor of 152 rates Colbert Hills third in the country. Not even The Belfry, where the world competed for the Ryder Cup this past weekend, is more difficult. The Belfry has a 150 slope.

Hole No. 11 (below) is one of the most difficult holes at Colbert. Water on the front and back left sides makes it impossible to run the ball up or be safe long.

Texas makes quick work of Cat volleyball, sweeps K-State on Ahearn court

By Sean Purcell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Overlooking an opponent can sometimes result in an eye-opening experience.

K-State's volleyball team learned that the hard way Saturday.

The Cats (6-6, 2-2) were swept by Texas (10-3, 2-2) in Ahearn Field House Saturday night, their first loss in three games by someone other than Nebraska since 1997.

"I really think we underestimated them," setter Gabby Guerre said. "We've beaten them seven straight matches, and last year we beat them soundly in Ahearn in four. So I strongly believe we overlooked them."

Guerre said she knew something was different during the team's preparation for the match.

"During the week, we were very strong emotionally, but our focus wasn't there," she said. "That had a big difference in how we played tonight. I don't think we were prepared for this match."

Texas proved it was bringing its A-game right from the beginning when it hit .359 and scored on 21 kills in game one.

K-State led late in the opening game, but a 5-0 Longhorn run closed the door on the Cats' chance to gain some early momentum.

Game 1: Texas 30, K-State 27

Game 2: Texas 30, K-State 26

Game 3: Texas 30, K-State 16

Texas coach Jerrett Elliott said he was proud of the way his team got out of the gates. He said winning the pass and serve is always important in volleyball, and that's what the team did in order to get into a rhythm early in the match.

"The pass and serve is like the offensive line in football," Elliott said. "If you can win that, you can give yourself a chance. We did that, and I think we eliminated what they wanted to do and got them out of system."

But Coach Suzie Fritz said she won't buy into the statement that Texas beat K-State.

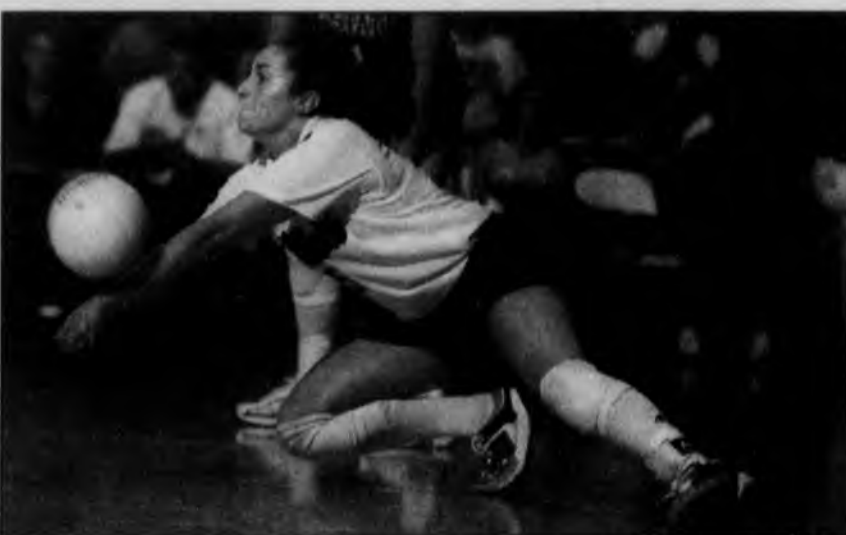

She said the Longhorns were a team the Cats could have beaten but didn't play well enough to do that.

"We're digging balls, but then we make a hitting error," Fritz said. "I didn't think it was the kills that got us. We just didn't challenge them and compete."

Game two was a carbon-copy of the first game — a back-and-forth battle.

Texas' serving was more of a factor, as it got three of five aces for the match in the second frame.

The Longhorns served short on a consistent basis, something the Cats weren't prepared for, outside hitter Jennifer Pollard said.

"Those short serves pretty much took away our right side," she said. "They could then kind of gang up on our left side, and we're not versatile that way — that makes us one-dimensional. And when a team's one-dimensional, they are easy to beat, and we were easy to beat tonight."

After the break between games two and three, the Cats showed early they weren't going to make a dramatic comeback.

Fritz was forced to take a timeout get done before dark," Norris said. "That's not much of a way to practice. We've been able to prepare better than we do for away tournaments."

The 12-team field includes Big 12 opponents Nebraska, Missouri, Colorado and Texas A&M, along with Tulsa, Louisiana-Lafayette, Rice, Toledo, Southern Methodist University, Lamar and the University of Texas at San Antonio.

The teams will play 36 holes Monday, beginning with a shotgun start at 9 a.m., and the teams will tee off for the final round at 9 a.m. Tuesday.

Coming off the Inverness Invitational in Toledo, Ohio, two weeks ago in which the Cats finished in a tie for third place, Norris said he likes the strength of the team, top to bottom.

"Everybody feels like that tournament in Toledo was one of the best tournaments in the history of the program," he said. "We had three players in the top 20, and the other two guys came in and maybe didn't play their best game, but at least they contributed.

"That's a real plus. I think their confidence is pretty high right now."

Norris will send four juniors and a sophomore to compete. Sophomore Jonathan James will join juniors Greg Douglas, Aaron Watkins, A.J. Elgert and Nick Schumacher.

"I'd like to see everybody step up and play well," Norris said. "The closer our team can get competitive-wise, from top to bottom, that's going to really help our team. So far we've done a pretty good job of that.

Colbert Hills

Colbert Hills was designed by K-State grad Jim Colbert and Jeffrey Brauer. The course is commonly called the "Big Course" in Kansas.

Jim Colbert earned a football scholarship to K-State and graduated in 1964 with a degree in political science. He joined the PGA Tour in 1966 and the Senior PGA Tour in 1991.

Hopefully that will continue.

"I want the top to get better, and I want the bottom to get better," he said. "That's what is going to help our team get better and improve every day."

played from the Black and Blue tee decks, also known as the "bruiser tees." Those add length where it is already tough to land the ball on the green.

There's a small creek in front of the green, as well as one along the hole's left side.

"It's possible to hit the green and make it roll back into the water," Norris said. "It's the only hole where you can't run the ball up on the green. It's one tough golf hole."

This long par 3 is simply a microcosm of the course that measures 7,525 yards.

There are seven par 4s that are 450 yards or longer.

"You have to hit it long and accurate," Gibson said.

Colbert is a lot of golf course, Gibson said. Most courses have more par 5s, so players will think of those holes as birdie opportunities, he said.

Not having those par 5s makes scoring at Colbert tough.

Colbert does have some short par 4s, but Norris said they are challenging.

"There are several holes where par is a good score," he said. "Players must play them hard on a calm day, and they must play them even harder when the wind is blowing."

The forecast is calling for mid-80s today and low 70s Tuesday.

Regardless of the conditions, Norris said all the players will have to stay focused because they will be challenged early and often on this course.

"Holes one, two and three are tough holes, especially with a south wind. Day in and day out, hole No. 1 is underrated. It's a very challenging opening hole," he said.

Norris said the course is in great shape. They've done a great job keeping the course in shape for two months without rain this summer, he said.

"It's going to be a great two days," Norris said.

Anti-globalization protests end with mixed results

By David Ho
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Threats to shut down the nation's capital and disrupt meetings of world financial leaders went unfulfilled Sunday as three days of demonstrations wrapped up much the way they started: with smaller-than-expected, peaceful gatherings.

Still, organizers contended goals were met. Attention was drawn, they said, to those opposing war, seeking more money for global AIDS research and calling for changes in world economic policies.

"It's been a highly successful couple of days," said David Levy, a protest organizer with the Mobilization for Global Justice. Levy was the only demonstrator to show up for a scheduled Sunday morning news conference to evaluate the weekend.

Police had prepared for as many as 20,000 demonstrators. During the largest event, on Saturday, several thousand protesters filled five city blocks as they shouted opposition to policies of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund, which were holding their annual meetings.

Levy said the anti-globalization movement has drawn public scrutiny to the policies of those financial institutions, which harm the environment and worsen conditions for poor, underdeveloped nations.

"No, we didn't change the state of the global economy," said Zoe Baldwin, 21, a college senior from Garfield, N.J. "The main purpose for most of these demonstrations, it's basically a huge outreach tool."

The final major event of the weekend was an anti-war march scheduled to end Sunday afternoon outside the residence of Vice President Dick Cheney. Several hundred people gathered in Washington's Dupont Circle for the start of the procession.

Meetings of global financial institutions have been a magnet to violence-scarred protests since 1999, when anti-globalization protesters clashed with police in Seattle. In April 2000, Washington police arrested about 1,300 people during demonstrations against the IMF and World Bank.

take security precautions it deems necessary.

According to the INS Sept. 5 memo, registration is required on arrival to and departure from the United States. The foreigners also must be interviewed at an INS office for stays of more than 30 days and notify the INS within 10 days of any change of residence, employment or academic institution.

The memo said immigration inspectors also can register visitors for national security reasons.

The memo said inspectors should consider whether the visitor has made an unexplained trip to Iran, Iraq, Libya, Sudan, Syria, North Korea, Cuba, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Yemen, Egypt, Somalia, Pakistan, Indonesia or Malaysia or if the visitor's explanation for the trip lacks credibility.

Among other things, inspectors will be told to consider registering foreign visitors who previously overstayed a U.S. visa or whose behavior, demeanor or answers indicate the person may be a security threat, the memo says.

Some Egyptian human rights activists criticized the measure.

"After the Sept. 11 attacks, security measures superseded human rights," said activist Hafez Abu Saada, adding that suspecting people for merely visiting certain countries is a presumption of guilt.

"Such enlargement of the circle of suspicion to encompass innocent people is a violation of human rights," he added.

Tammy earned her bachelor's degree from K-State in agribusiness in 1996, Tonya also earned her degree in agribusiness from K-State in 1999, and Tina is planning to graduate in May 2003 with a bachelor's degree in agricultural economics.

Throughout the day, the Hooblers were honored at a variety of events, including the Dean's Dinner with Pat Bosco, Dean of Student Life, and receiving a plaque during the women's volleyball game against the University of Texas.

Chimes, a society that focuses on the ideals of leadership, scholarship and service, has sponsored the event for several years, Peter Carter, president of Chimes, said.

"This is a way to honor a family that embodies what K-State is all about and who gives time, effort and spirits to KSU," Carter said.

As in previous years, Carter said the Hoobler family proved that a large focus of K-State has not only been the student body but families as well.

"This entire family has been around the school for years, and they bleed purple," he said.

While the winning family was selected by Tina's essay, she gave credit to K-State for its support.

"Everyone talks about K-State being a family," she said. "The school does a good job of bringing in families, and that's special."

after Texas jumped out to an early 7-1 lead. The Cats would get as close as 12-7 but couldn't put together a big run that would allow them to get back in the third game and extend the match.

Pollard said it was frustrating to see the enthusiasm leave team members once they were down early.

"The attitude coming back up was not what it was on the court," Pollard said. "We were ready to get back out there, but once the game started, and they got up 7-1, we knew it would be hard to dig ourselves out of a hole like that."

"We were waiting for things to happen instead of making things happen."

Goehring said it was hard to describe how the team played. Bad, she said, pretty much summed it up.

"I'm extremely frustrated and a little embarrassed, too," Goehring said. "It's a pretty humbling experience when you're a good team but you don't play like one. We just have to work a whole lot harder now."

County alleges KSU broke agreement

Service agents' benefits in question

By Nancy Foster
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

University and county officials disagree as to whether K-State broke a 57-year agreement.

Riley County Commission Chairman Bob Newsome said last week that K-State's Cooperative Extension Service did not honor its longstanding agreement to pay for service agents' health benefits, forcing the county to pay.

But Director of Extension Marc Johnson, dean of agriculture, said K-State paid its bills.

However, he said substantial budget cuts caused the university to seek help from Kansas counties. Extension officials proposed three options to the Kansas Extension Agents Association and the State Extension Advisory Council on how to manage the cuts. The options included the following: cut the number of extension agents, reduce the block grant the university gives counties, or have county extension councils begin paying a portion of the non-retirement benefits.

KEAA and the advisory council both chose the latter, which will apply to budgets beginning January 2003.

"We had a big budget challenge, we have received input from our county partners, and the university is following the recommendation made by the county partners," Johnson, university

Statehouse's new adornment makes trip to Manhattan

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Today from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. outside the K-State Student Union Plaza, students will be able to view a part of history, the sculpture "Ad Astra," which is on its way to adorn the Statehouse's dome.

"It's been a 14-year saga," Lori Bergen, associate professor at the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, said. "I don't think anybody paid attention to the reality of it going up until it was loaded on the flatbed. Then everybody wanted to talk to my dad."

Her father, Richard Bergen, a 1963 K-State graduate, is the sculptor of the 4,420-pound statue.

The bronze statue is called "Ad Astra" and comes from the state motto, "ad astra per aspera," which is Latin for "to the stars through difficulties."

"Ad Astra" is sculpted in the likeness of a Kansas Native American shooting an arrow. The arrow will aim toward the North Star when in place on the dome.

Richard Bergen is in the process of taking "Ad Astra" on a 30-city tour of Kansas before the statue reaches the Statehouse in Topeka.

The decoration of the dome has been an issue since construction on the Statehouse concluded in 1901.

More than 100 years ago, Kansas officials planned to top the Statehouse with a statue of Ceres, the Roman goddess of agriculture.

Legislators objected to the plan because of stories of her promiscuous behavior and because they didn't want to honor a pagan deity.

ONE CUT, WITH LOVE

Katie Lester | COLLEGIAN

Abbe Doll makes the final cut on Dana Ellis' hair to be donated to Locks of Love, a not-for-profit organization.

Katie Lester | COLLEGIAN

Abbe Doll, designer for Hair Experts, cuts the hair of Dana Ellis, senior in elementary education. Ellis didn't want to see three years of hair growth just end up on the floor, so she decided to donate it to Locks of Love.

Not-for-profit organization provides wigs for children with hair-loss diseases

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten inches.
Three years.

And it was all gone in seconds.

Dana Ellis, senior in elementary education, cut off about 10 inches of her hair Monday morning to benefit Locks of Love, a not-for-profit organization that provides hairpieces to financially disadvantaged children under the age of 18 with medical hair loss.

"I have been thinking about it for a long time," Ellis said. "And instead of just cutting all of it off for no reason, I decided to donate it to Locks of Love."

Sounds easy, but Ellis' face told a different story as Hair Experts designer Abbe Doll showed her the 10 inches of hair bundled in a ponytail.

"Oh my gosh," Ellis said as she covered her mouth in astonishment. "It's OK. I feel OK."

It helps, she said, knowing it goes toward a good cause.

Locks of Love provides children with a custom, vacuum-fitted hairpiece made entirely from donated human hair.

"It looks natural," said Cathleen Cason, executive assistant for the organization.

"It just really gives them back their self-esteem."

The vacuum-fit, which does not require the use of tape or glue, is designed for children who have experienced a total loss of scalp hair. Most recipients, Cason said, suffer from an autoimmune condition called alopecia areata.

In alopecia areata, the affected hair follicles are mistakenly attacked by a person's own immune system, resulting in no hair growth. The onset most often begins in childhood, according to the National Alopecia Areata Foundation.

"It is long-term, permanent hair loss," she said. "Thanks to the donors, we are able to give these children a part of their life back."

The hairpieces take about four months to make, so the majority of the children receiving them have permanent conditions like alopecia areata. Others have suffered severe burns or have endured radiation treatment to the brain stem.

Contrary to popular belief, the hairpieces are not used for people undergoing chemotherapy because hair loss from that treatment is temporary, Cason said.

But regardless of who receives the hair, Cason said, the hairpiece is extremely important in gaining self-worth during the disease.

"Knowing I am helping someone makes it easier to decide to cut it off," she said.

Doll said that most donors have their minds made up before they come to the salon, but she always goes through a full consultation with them before she cuts their hair.

"We talk about what would benefit their facial shape and what would suit their lifestyle before we cut," Doll said. "It is extremely important because the people that donate have been growing their hair out for years. It is going to be a huge change."

It is a change for the better, though, Doll said. "It is nice to know they are donating the hair instead of letting me sweep it up and throw it away," she said.

"It is really courageous of them."

But despite her courage, Ellis doesn't think she is doing anything incredibly special.

"It gives me a reason to grow out my hair," she said. "I am just glad I decided to do it. It was worth it."

Area administrators taking precautions against cyberterrorism attacks

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With the rise in cyberterrorism, local businesses, along with K-State and the city of Manhattan, have taken precautions to protect their computer systems.

Harold Vandeventer, network administrator and telecom manager for DPRA Computing Services, said the company has not had any critical computer breakdowns due to cyberterrorism.

"We've had some problems," he said. "Not serious ones — a few years ago some viruses were brought in on floppy disks."

Vandeventer said they were able to stop the viruses with desktop virus scanning software.

"We have two ways of attacking viruses and things like that," he said. "We have virus scanning for all e-mails and desktop virus scanning."

First Bank, which includes locations in Manhattan, Junction City and Lawrence, has never had any computer complications related to cyberterrorism, an official said.

"We have not had any viruses that have damaged machines," said Dale Martinson, vice president of information systems at First Bank. "We have had them try to get into our systems, though."

Martinson said the bank uses several methods to help ensure the safety of its systems.

"We have a firewall, of course, and each server runs a virus scan," he said. "All of these scanning systems update daily."

The majority of the cyberterrorism that First Bank has experienced has been e-mail related, Martinson said.

"We have had e-mails with viruses in them," he said. "The surprising thing is that when I traced them back, they came from other businesses' systems and not from a client or other individual computer system."

Martinson said that each time an infected e-mail has been received at one of the bank's locations, the anti-virus station stopped it before any damage could be done.

Officials from the city of Manhattan have also taken steps to ensure that the computer systems stay safe.

Gregg Gibson, information systems manager, said he believes the system that is now in use is safe and effective.

FACES IN THE CROWD

Seagal's religious advice won't save him from trial

Illustration by Adam Hayes | COLLEGIAN

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

A judge has refused to throw out a $60 million lawsuit against Steven Seagal that alleges the action film star backed out of movie projects on the advice of his Buddhist spiritual adviser.

Judge Joseph Maltese ruled Thursday that the case filed by Seagal's previous business partner, producer Julius Nasso, can proceed to trial.

Nasso is suing Seagal for allegedly reneging on a contract to perform in four motion pictures, which had a combined budget of more than $125 million.

In the lawsuit, Nasso accuses Seagal of backing out on the advice of a Buddhist spiritual adviser known as Mukara, who allegedly persuaded Seagal to detach himself from his associates and even his children.

Buddhist conference starts

Richard Gere and Goldie Hawn joined Buddhist philosophers and Nobel laureates in northern India Monday at the exile headquarters of the Dalai Lama for a meeting of minds on science and modern ethics.

Hawn and Gere will be observers at the five-day conference. Both are prominent supporters of the Nobel Peace Prize-winning Dalai Lama, the Tibetan spiritual leader who fled his homeland after a failed uprising against Chinese communist troops who occupied the Himalayan territory in 1951.

The actors also will join Buddhist philosophers, Nobel-winning physicist Steven Chu and other scientists, for the forum on "The Nature of Matter, the Nature of Life."

The conference aims to bring Buddhist and scientific perspectives to modern ethics and science issues.

Agassi's concert successful

Andre Agassi's annual charity concert raised $5.6 million for his foundation, which helps at-risk children in Las Vegas.

Elton John joined Rod Stewart in a duet of "Your Song" Saturday night at a celebrity-packed benefit.

John welcomed Stewart to the stage as "my dear friend and female impersonator." In response, the veteran rocker wiggled his shoulders and batted his eyes at John near the end of the seventh Grand Slam for Children concert at the MGM Grand Garden Arena.

Leary raises $400,000

Actor-comedian Denis Leary led a team of celebrities and former hockey players in raising more than $400,000 during a charity hockey game.

The Sunday event raised money for the Worcester and New York City fire departments.

Leary hosted the third annual Celebrity Hat Trick, which pits a team of celebrities, including actors Rick Moranis and Tim Robbins and Sen. John Kerry, against retired Boston Bruins.

United Way kicks off October campaign at Union

Festivities to include agency fair, music, volunteer opportunities, donation information

By Megan Wolke
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's Oct. 1, and students can start off the month by attending the K-State United Way Campaign Kickoff, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union Courtyard.

"The campaign will take place throughout October," said Aileen Cray, executive director of United Way of Riley County.

Cray said she hopes the day will create an awareness of how United Way uses its money. She said she also wants the day to be fun.

Students feeling the need to contribute their time to special organizations, such as Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan Inc., will have the chance to learn more about how they can make this contribution at the kickoff.

Volunteer opportunities and paid internships are some options students can choose to learn about, Cray said.

The campaign also includes an agency fair with several United Way-funded agencies being represented. Deb Patterson, coach of the women's basketball team also will be making a speech on behalf of United Way around noon.

The K-State band also will have members playing at the kickoff.

Volunteers will hand out

Campaign kickoff

- Time: 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.
- Place: K-State Student Union Courtyard
- What to expect: Interested students will have the opportunity to learn about volunteer positions, paid internships, and how to make contributions to the United Way.

packets to faculty and staff on how to make contributions to United Way.

Megan Tagle, educational program director for Big Brothers-Big Sisters, hopes the day will better inform the community of the ways United Way uses its money.

She also said it will be a good way to recruit volunteers.

Another group represented at the kickoff will be the Manhattan Girl Scouts.

Margaret Moore, Girl Scouts representative, said that when people give to United Way they give to the community.

Girl Scouts and Big Brothers-Big Sisters are just two of the agencies being represented at the agency fair.

Other agencies include the American Red Cross, Boys and Girls Club, Sunflower CASA Project, and the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

Cray said she's excited about the kickoff.

"It's time to do the United Way thing," Cray said.

Rumsfeld angered by enemy fire, calls Iraqi actions 'patently false'

By Matt Kelley
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON D.C. — The Bush administration criticized Iraq on Monday for continuing to fire at U.S. and British warplanes patrolling two no-fly zones while preparing for the return of United Nations weapons inspectors.

"With each missile launched at our air crews, Iraq expresses its contempt for the U.N. resolutions," Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld said at a Pentagon news briefing.

Iraq has fired no-fly-zone patrols 67 times since promising two weeks ago, on Sept. 16, to allow U.N. weapons inspectors back into the country, said Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Iraq has never shot down a coalition plane.

The Bush administration is trying to persuade Congress and the United Nations to approve resolutions authorizing the use of military force to oust Saddam. Bush says Saddam is stockpiling biological and chemical weapons and trying to obtain nuclear bombs in violation of U.N. resolutions.

His voice rising, Rumsfeld said Iraq's claimed willingness to allow open weapons inspections was "patently false." The defense secretary said Iraq has lied so many times that no one should trust what Saddam's government says.

"It bothers the dickens out of me that U.S. and British pilots are getting fired at day after day after day, with impunity," Rumsfeld said.

TO THE POINT Red ink issues override decor of Statehouse

Placing a 5,000-pound statue atop the Statehouse in Topeka shouldn't be a main concern of legislators hoping to win voters in November.

But the "Ad Astra" addition to the dome has been an issue of debate in the capital. Republican gubernatorial candidate Tim Shallenberger went as far as calling it "lawn art." Others are wondering why the state is dishing out $700,000 for a statue when, meanwhile, budget cuts have been issued across the board and, more importantly, education funding has gone under the knife.

The statue is heading to Topeka regardless of whether officials like it. The issue now should be what our campaigning legislators deem more important to debate about.

Voters heading to the booths in November are not interested in whether the bronze statue will replace a light bulb at the Statehouse.

Issues that candidates need to start pushing on their platforms should include how the state of Kansas is going to survive the economic slump and, more importantly to the thousands of student voters, how educational institutions are going to survive more potential budget cuts.

4 KEYS TO PLAYING HARD WHILE WORKING HARD

Seattle fish market shares philosophy of mixing business with pleasure

Transitioning from being a carefree college student to an actual adult is turning out to be a lot more complicated than I ever thought it would be.

Instead of going out and having a good time, I am trying to figure out how to afford law school along with my new car. I am planning to get married and move away from the Little Apple.

I am focusing on my future. Senior year shouldn't be this difficult. So, what can we do to make our senior year something we can get through without tearing our hair out? We should all just go FISH!

I don't mean we should literally grab the pole and worms and head for the lake. We should implement the FISH! philosophy into our lives.

What is the FISH! philosophy? According to www.charthouse.com, it's an approach to business developed by a Seattle fish market and has been used in corporations all over the world.

Books and films have been created to spread the FISH! philosophy, and it's time to use it to cure the dreadful disease of senioritis.

The FISH! philosophy has four simple steps anyone can use whether suffering from senioritis or not.

1. Play.
Find a way to incorporate some playtime into that packed planner. Take a class strictly for fun and enjoyment, or use a break between classes to enjoy the beauty of our campus. Do something you've been meaning to do for the past three years and have just never gotten around to. The little things really can make a difference.

2. Make their day.
Do something nice for someone else. The only thing keeping me sane this year is being a teaching assistant for the Introduction to Leadership Concepts class. My small group only meets once a week, but it someone's day by smiling as you pass them on campus. Volunteer at a local grade school and let yourself be reminded of the important things in life — snack time and recess.

3. Be there.
It is easy to live in the future and neglect the present when you are undergoing transition. Instead of spending your class time daydreaming about what post-graduation life is going to be like, try to actually participate in what's going on. Be there, as in where you actually are, instead of where you want to be in the future. By concentrating on the present, you will be able to use your energies much more efficiently. You should focus on what you want to accomplish now, in order to take full advantage of the current moment and prepare for those moments to come.

4. Choose your attitude.
What are you thinking when you get out of bed in the morning? Are you wishing you could hit that snooze button just one more time, or are you excited you have another day to experience? There is a large extent to which we decide what kind of attitude we're going to face the world with on any given day. If you are determined to trudge grumpily through your classes until you can return to your bed for an afternoon nap, you will manage to have a bad day.

But what if you decide to enjoy class and be grateful for your opportunity to partake in higher education? If you can use your willpower to stay awake all night to finish a paper or to go to the gym on a regular basis, why can't you use your willpower to enjoy yourself in class?

That's FISH! No matter how difficult this final year might be, I am certain that by implementing the FISH! strategy we can do it all and have a good time.

Next time somebody asks how you are, tell them you're feeling a little fishy.

Strip clubs make for interesting, harmless fun

From the "Man Show" to Demi Moore to Betty Page, the stripper has become a thought-provoking object of American culture.

The strip show has been giggled about, fantasized over and debated as degrading, liberating or pragmatic, depending on your view. My ideas of strip clubs were limited to second-hand accounts, movies and episodes of "Married With Children," so I figured it was time I saw what it was all about.

My friends and I watched girls — some more attractive than others — dance topless, and paid them to give us some attention.

We went home after having a good time, and I didn't feel the least bit misogynistic. It's not something I bragged about to my friends in Ordinary Women either, but I didn't feel like I'd done a bad thing.

That's because there isn't anything wrong with it.

The truth is, we all had a few laughs and a lot of fun. There was one girl who worked kind of like those beds you see in the movies in cheap hotels. If you put a dollar in her G-string, she'd vibrate on you.

Some of the girls truly had acrobatic skills with that big brass pole, too. You have to give them some props when they hold onto that thing with their legs and go upside down.

Sure, strip clubs are seedy and sleazy, and some of the patrons are just plain gross. But that's all part of the experience. Go with an open mind, knowing that it isn't for everyone, but life is about living through the clean as well as the dirty.

To really get an understanding of this situation, go in mixed company if possible. Grab some friends, male and female, and drive to a club with an adventurous spirit and plenty of $1 bills.

Some think stripping for money is degrading to women, but these women have freely chosen this profession. If a woman, decides shaking her bare ass for money is a good idea, then it should be her right.

At the very worst, a girl will take the job because she can't find anything else that pays as well. At best, stripping actually can become an art and an outlet for creative energy.

A friend of mine recently talked to me about her one-night experience as a stripper. She got hired, danced for one night, and immediately knew it wasn't for her. That choice is available to anyone.

Plenty of people don't want strip clubs in residential neighborhoods, and it is completely understandable that parents do not want children near the night spots. They can get shady. But in the right spot, a club generates legitimate revenue through adult entertainment.

Admittedly, it would be pathetic to become a nightly regular, but an occasional visit just helps out some young girls with a job that most would not consider very desirable.

Pay a visit to the girls who take names like Ice, Candy and Misty Mountains before you knock topless dancing. It's something to try on a night out when there isn't anything else to do. Strippers are girls, and sometimes guys, just trying to make some cash.

Excalibur is hiring male erotic dancers — maybe I should see what it's like from the other side of the G-string.

The reason why I was chewing my toenails is because it's really difficult to get the big toenails off without having toenail clippers. Unless you use scissors, you pretty much have to use your teeth.

Who calls in and says their moms are hot? Now my girlfriend, she's freakin' hot.

To my girlfriend, Angie: I think you're beautiful.

I don't think it's very logical to say humans evolved from bacteria. Someone had to take care of the first baby.

I'm serious, you jerk. Not one woman on the K-State campus has asked to sleep with you, so pull your pants back up and go study.

To the person who called in about the record for the Fourum: The guy who said he had the record of four said it was his own personal record.

For the person who thought his girlfriend was really cute having sleepovers and she might be a lesbian: Why don't you try getting your own

Maybe if the library didn't spend so much of its budget on computers with Internet access, then it could afford to keep its doors open.

I would like to thank the K-State men's football and basketball for helping us clean up after our party last night. We really appreciate it fellas. Keep up the good work.

Define psycho — when your roommate's ex-boyfriend walks into your apartment at 1 a.m. uninvited.

It's a sad day when dirty girl has more sex than I do.

My roommate went home this weekend and her dad sent a football media guide back with her so she can put a face with the name when the players get arrested.

For the people who just had sex: Who freakin' cares?

I really hope the guys with the hot moms are not the ones who just had sex.

Who steals a freaking Darwin fish? What was the point of that?

Did anybody else get hit with a freakin' water balloon this weekend?

Did that 80 percent include sex with yourself, or just sex with others?

Did the 80 percent include animals? There are a lot of farmers who go to this school.

Tip of the day: getting trashed and hitting on your roommate's girlfriend — not cool.

I wish you didn't have a girlfriend because you were amazing.

To the girl who was picking her nose the other day at the stop sign: That was really funny.

High-speed Internet, high-speed porn.

If Micah Hawkinson really believes that Communists just want people to be nice to each other and share their stuff, then perhaps he can explain why they slaughtered 100 million people in the last century.

Does anybody know what the hell was up with I-70 west of Topeka? My God.

Hey, football players, just because it's a bye-week doesn't mean it's a high-week.

I was just wondering how unhealthy it is for three of us to be procrastinating right now, talking about how unhealthy it is to procrastinate.

The apple pies are cooling on the windowsill.

I think Clovia girls are hot. Yeah, they're hot.

Maybe I should quit school and become a porn star.

BREEDING NEW SOUNDS

Local bands combine country, rock 'n' roll to create undefinable genre of music

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Country is just a label like any other music genre. But what's in a name? What is it about our cognitive process that tempts us to create a word or short phrase to describe complex subjects?

Creating order and abbreviating the thought process are nice, but sometimes it's not as easy as that. There is an ambiguous mixture of country and rock 'n' roll that has been gaining popularity nationally.

In Manhattan, live performances from local bands the Pembertons and Mankato and national touring acts like the Meat Purveyors and Slobberbone have exposed the Little Apple to this return-to-roots music.

Coming up with an inclusive term to describe a type of music is not as easy as naming a subspecies of rattlesnakes. In music, labeling a sound can be less efficient than leaving it abstract.

Alternative country, Americana, country rock, progressive country, grange rock, hillbilly noir, insurgent country, new old-time, twangcore, and roots rock are all names used to describe bands in this musical vein.

Dave Spiker, drummer for the Pembertons, said he likes to use the term whiskey rock 'n' roll to describe his band's rough honky tonk sound. Listening to a live performance or the band's "Starting the Fire" EP, reveals a band that loves to sing about quintessential country subjects, like truck stops and hard labor.

The Pembertons have gained a healthy following in Manhattan with numerous shows at Aggieville venues and are gaining recognition by playing gigs throughout the area.

"Hopefully we'll be a gateway band for people around here," Spiker said. "There's a lot of hard-working bands out there that people might not have been exposed to."

Mankato is another Manhattan band that brings rustic sounds to rock and roll. Mankato combines elements of bluegrass, folk and rock, which they perform in a stripped-down simplistic style. Guitarist and vocalist Nathan Page said even he has trouble defining his band's sound.

"I'd say folk-rock, but I don't even really know what that means," Page said.

The multitude of descriptive titles implies that many musicians aren't comfortable being classified, but Page understands the importance. Page said labels help audiences and bands find what they're looking for.

"If I went to go see what I was told was an emo band and they had an upright bass and an accordion, I'd be pretty pissed," Page said.

Page said classifications lose some of their meaning when the terms get popularized, such as alternative in the mid-'90s, but creating subdivisions of styles revitalizes and clarifies the meaning.

Spiker said some of the confusion regarding what to call the country rock genre comes from its diversity.

"There's just so many different niches, there's really no two bands that sound alike," Spiker said.

This problem with nomenclature has been going on since the music first came into being during the late '60s. Gram Parsons, considered to be the godfather of country rock, hated the labels that journalists were attaching to his music. Parsons preferred the term "Cosmic American Music," but the name never managed to take root.

Although his proposed title never became popular, Parsons inspired countless artists through his music and his life. He personified the perfect blend of country despondency and rock and roll decadence.

Parsons pioneered country rock while playing in the International Submarine Band, the Byrds and the Flying Burrito Brothers. He also had a heavy influence on the Rolling Stones' "Exile on Main Street." After releasing two highly acclaimed but unsuccessful solo albums, "G.P." and "Grievous Angel," he overdosed on tequila and morphine.

After Parsons' death, country rock lived on through the likes of Neil Young, Steve Earle and Bruce Springsteen. The urban cowboy sound has been consistently present, but it has always taken a back seat to the more conservative mainstream country. Kenny Rogers and Dolly Parton were at the top of the charts when the catalyst that brought about this most recent surge of country rock appeared on the outskirts of St. Louis.

Uncle Tupelo was formed in Belleville, Ill., during the 1980s. The band originally started as a Black Flag-type punk band, but the group eventually found itself playing music that was more similar to the old-time country their parents liked. Uncle Tupelo ended up transforming country rock into country punk rock and they fueled a new movement in music.

The introduction of Uncle Tupelo spawned a horde of similar bands like Whiskeytown (fronted by the now-popular solo artist, Ryan Adams), the Jawhawks, and Freakwater. In its break-up, Uncle Tupelo begat two of the most successful alternative country bands, Son Volt and Wilco.

Jeff Denney, manager of Auntie Mae's, said Uncle Tupelo had a big impact on college radio during its existence, and its influence was strong in Manhattan. "When I moved here in the late '80s, that was all you heard on college radio," Denney said, "You weren't cool unless you knew what was going on in those bands."

Denney is largely responsible for the current country craze in Manhattan by bringing acts like the Damns, the Kirk Rundstrom Band and tomorrow night's Southern Culture on the Skids to Auntie Mae's. In fact, Denney hired Pembertons front man Bro as a bartender and filled his jukebox with country rock.

As a drummer for one of the bands that is keeping this music in Manhattan, Spiker said his band is continuing on regardless of how cool country gets.

"This type of music has been in the area for a long time with bands like Truck Stop Love, who had a good following," Spiker said, "I think that it will always be around and there will always be some people listening to it."

Local artist makes it to finals in 'KC Idol'

On Sunday night, singer/songwriter Sarah Callaghan, junior in humanities, traveled to the Beaumont Club in Kansas City, Mo., to compete against nine other finalists in KCHZ-FM 95.7's "KC Idol" contest, but failed to make the top three.

Besides performing for a large crowd, the exposure she received was both local and national. A producer from Arista Records took down Callaghan's number.

"I made it into the top 10, which I was OK with," Callaghan said. "But I had a lot of people come up after the show and told me how impressed they were with my performance, which made me feel good."

R&B cover acts saturated the contest, which seemed to be the opposite end of the musical spectrum, she said. Although the contest may have been judged based on a different genre, Callaghan said, it was definitely worth her time.

"It was a lot of fun and I'm proud that I made it as far as I did," she said. "I can't believe that I made it that far. I'd like to thank everyone who voted and supported me through all of this."

Egyptian statue confirmed to represent Cleopatra

Art experts nosing through the vast collection of The Hermitage have concluded that an ancient Egyptian statue represents the queen Cleopatra — a conclusion based partly on the size of the statue's nose.

The statue is the centerpiece of an exhibition that shows how researchers work to unravel the often obscure meanings of works of art.

The museum acquired the black basalt statue in 1929.

In 1957, a museum Egyptologist judged that it portrayed Arsinoe II, who was queen in 316-270 B.C.

But later researchers noted that three snakes were carved on the statue's forehead. That sign is characteristic only of Cleopatra, who ruled in 69-30 B.C. — Arsinoe conventionally was depicted with two snakes.

NFL | Jets go with Pennington

Vinny Testaverde was benched Monday by New York Jets coach Herman Edwards, who said he will turn to Chad Pennington to spark the team's dormant, mistake-riddled offense.

Pennington, who played most of Sunday's 28-3 loss at Jacksonville that dropped the Jets to 1-3, will make his first NFL start next weekend against Kansas City. Pennington, a first-round draft pick in 2000, replaced Testaverde early in the loss to the Jaguars after the 38-year-old Testaverde bruised his shoulder.

NFL | Warner's return questionable

Kurt Warner's broken little finger will require surgery, the St. Louis Rams said Monday.

No timetable for the return of last year's NFL MVP has been set. On Sunday, the team estimated he would be sidelined at least a month.

Two years ago, Warner broke the same finger and missed five games.

Warner was injured in the first quarter of Sunday's 13-10 loss to the Dallas Cowboys. Backup Jamie Martin went the rest of the way, throwing a touchdown pass and an interception.

MLB | Tigers fire Pujols; Rays can McRae

Manager Luis Pujols was fired Monday by the Detroit Tigers after their worst season in six years.

Pujols, who replaced Phil Garner in April after an 0-6 start, led the Tigers to a 55-106 finish, tied for the worst record in the major leagues. His winning percentage of .355 is the lowest for a manager in club history.

The Tigers lost to the Blue Jays 1-0 Sunday, ending their worst season since they went 53-109 in 1996. Detroit had the worst record in the major leagues after the All-Star break (24-51).

Hal McRae was fired as manager of the Tampa Bay Devil Rays on Monday, one day after the team finished a 55-106 season.

It was the second straight season of 100 or more losses for the Devil Rays, and the worst record for the team since it began play in 1998.

McRae replaced Larry Rothschild on April 18, 2001, and managed the Devil Rays to a 58-90 record over the remainder of the season. McRae had been hired the previous November as bench coach.

NBA | Jordan still determined to start

Michael Jordan isn't ready to give up his spot in the starting lineup just yet.

Jordan said Monday he'll keep an "open mind" about the possibility of playing this season as a backup for the Washington Wizards, but he would prefer to be on the floor at tipoff.

Speaking for the first time since last week's announcement that he would play this season, Jordan also outlined a new plan to help him last the season: He's overhauled his workout regimen, and he probably won't play in any exhibition games.

COLBERT CONFIDENCE

Wildcats comfortable in 3rd place

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Colbert Hills is one of the toughest golf courses in the country on a calm day.

Monday wasn't a calm day. With winds gusting at an estimated 30 mph from the south, the course offered tough challenges for the 12-team field.

"This course can beat you down, and I'm sure there will be some horror stories, but it's hard," Coach Tim Norris said.

"It's never been advertised as easy. We took some licks like everybody else did."

"This course doesn't care if you're wearing purple or navy blue. It's demanding."

K-State, with a score of 618, is in third place going into today's final round, trailing only Southern Methodist (604) and Lamar (615). The Wildcats finished the second round with a score of 301 — 16 strokes better than their morning score of 317.

The Wildcats were led by junior co-captain Aaron Watkins, who shot back-to-back 72s.

His two-round 144 was good for a one-shot lead over Texas A&M's Shaun Helmle.

Junior Greg Douglas struggled in the first round with a 85, but turned it around in the afternoon with an even-par 72.

"I'm really proud of Greg Douglas," Norris said.

"He wasn't in too good of spirits after this morning's round, but he came with a 13-shot turn-around this afternoon. That's pretty special."

K-State has struggled in the first rounds of all three of its tournaments this season, something Norris said he would like to see change.

"We stayed fairly close," he said.

"When you have three of your top five shoot in the 80s, you feel kind of lucky to escape with being around 10 shots out of the lead after the morning. Anything can happen out here, and usually does."

"A 10-shot lead could go in one or two holes out here. You can't rush things, and you can't force the issue out here or you're going to run into some big numbers."

Norris said his team has a slight advantage over other teams in the wind at Colbert hills, but said conditions were still a factor for every squad.

"They just know what to expect," he said. "Seven and 10, both 600-yard par-5 holes, were very, very reachable for the whole field. Then you get up on 17 and it's hard to reach the green on a par-3 with a driver."

"When I went out and got my paper this morning at five o'clock and it was blowing I said, 'Oh boy.' When it's blowing early in the morning like that, you're probably going to have a full day."

Colbert final round action

K-State sits in third place going into today's final round of the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate. The final 18 holes begin with a 9 a.m. shotgun start. Wildcat junior Aaron Watkins sits in first place, one stroke ahead of Texas A&M's Shaun Helmle.

Getting the ball out of the sand, Aaron Watkins plays hole seven at Colbert Hills Golf Course as part of the 2002 Jim Colbert Intercollegiate tournament Monday morning. The final round will be this morning.

Watkins leads individual field by 1

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Growing up in Mesa, Ariz., Aaron Watkins wasn't exposed to the kind of winds he faced Monday at Colbert Hills Golf Course.

But that didn't seem to bother him. "He plays this course well," Coach Tim Norris said. "When he got here, he didn't know what wind was. Coming from Arizona, they think if it's over 10 miles an hour, then it's kite-flying weather."

Watkins fired an even-par 72 in Monday's rounds at the Jim Colbert Intercollegiate at Colbert Hills.

Watkins' combined score of 144 was good enough for a 1-stroke lead heading into final-round action today.

"Today was all patience," he said. "Normally, you just want to make birdie, but today you just wanted to make par. Birdies were just a bonus."

"I started to putt really well starting the back nine in the morning, and it just continued. I hit a lot of greens. That was really the key today — just keeping it out of trouble."

Watkins, ranked 54th in the Sagarin rankings, said he would like to see calmer conditions in the final round, in hopes of making a few birdies.

"I'd like to do the same thing," he said. "Just try to make some more pars and hopefully make some birdies. There's still a lot of birdies out there, but there weren't many of them today."

Practicing every day on Colbert Hills' holes, some of which are in the wind, can give K-State golfers an advantage, but Watkins said it was still

Royals end season with disappointments; future looks bright

The Kansas City Royals lost 7-3 to Cleveland on Sunday. It was loss No. 100 for the team.

Few people watched. Luckily for Kansas City fans, the Chiefs blew out Miami and the Kansas Speedway purred with racing on that day.

As a result, bad baseball was forgettable.

Still, 62-100 is a pathetic record.
